PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS THIRD SESSION.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our daily task begins with thoughts of Thee. Our hearts arise to Thy throne as we face the dread responsibilities of this hour. We ask the divine guidance in every disposition of our hearts and every faculty of our minds, that our whole spirit may be given up to God to work out His divine plan in us as a Nation. Thou hast dealt with us more wonderfully than Thou has dealt with any other people. Thou hast laid upon us an immeasurable debt of gratitude to Thee for Thy kindness and for all Thy goodness. Help us to respond with truthful, glad, and willing hearts to Thine own call for service. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, January 20, 1919, when, on request of Mr. KING and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE (S. DOC. NO. 347).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Council of National Defense transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 15, 1918, a report of all money received and disbursed, together with liabilities and available balances up to December 31, 1918, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WAR TRADE BOARD (S. DOC. NO. 346).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the vice chairman of the War Trade Board transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 15, 1918, a report of all money received and disbursed, together with liabilities and available balances up to and including December 31, 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 1703).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing all withdrawals of public lands from December 1, 1917, to November 30, 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF WAR DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 348).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, a report relative to applications for reinstatement of certain civil-service employees of the War Department after discharge from the military service, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the Acting Secretary of State (S. Doc. No. 359), the Secretary of War (S. Doc. No. 356), the Secretary of Agriculture (S. Doc. STATE OF KANSAS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, L. J. Pettijohn, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true copy of house concurrent resolution 4, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed my official seal.

Done at the city of Topeka, this 22d day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.]

L. J. PETTIJOHN,
Secretary of State.

House concurrent resolution 4.

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a constitutional amendment providing for national woman suffrage; and

Whereas it is an acknowledged fact that the enfranchisement of the women of Kansas has worked satisfactorily and tended toward better government in this State; and

Whereas equality and justice to all people for which the nations of the world have been struggling and for which the great war has been waged, requires the granting of suffrage to American women who equally with the men of this country have borne the burdens of the war and have loyally and ungrudgingly given their sons and their personal services that liberty might live and the world be made free to the end that our own Government might not perish: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Kansas, That the Senate of the United States is most earnestly requested to without delay pass the Federal amendment giving the women of the United States full suffrage.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house, and passed that body January 15, 1919.

W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Speaker of the House.
CLARENCE W. MILLER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Senate memorial 1.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States, petitioning the Government to pass the Federal suffrage amendment.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that:

Whereas the Federal amendment to grant the right of suffrage to women equally with men has been before the Congress of the United States for more than 40 years; and

Whereas the women of the nonsuffrage States feel that the time is come when the Congress should give favorable consideration to this measure of justice to one-half the citizens of these United States.

Now, therefore, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that the said suffrage amendment receive immediate and favorable consideration before the Sixty-fifth session of Congress adjourns.

The foregoing senate memorial was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the president of the senate, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 16th day of January, 1919.

J. W. FUNK,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

ADAM L. PETERSON,
Secretary of Senate.

The foregoing senate memorial was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the speaker of the house in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 16th day of January, 1919.

Senate joint memorial 1.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon respectfully represent that—

Whereas a measure providing for the submission of a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage is now pending before the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas equal suffrage was adopted in Oregon in November, 1912, and has during its six years of operation proved a complete success in every particular: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Oregon (the House of Representatives concurring), That we do heartily indorse equal suffrage and pronounce it an unqualified benefit and success, and we do respectfully request and petition the United States Senate to take favorable and immediate action on the measure now pending before it providing for the submission to the several States of a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage throughout the United States, and we do urgently petition the members of the Oregon delegation to use their best efforts toward securing the adoption thereof; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the chief clerk of the Oregon Senate to the President and Vice President of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from Oregon in the United States Congress.

Adopted by the house January 14, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 14, 1919.

W. J. VINTON,
President of the Senate.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., January 26, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of the United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed to wire you the following resolution enrolled by the Senate of the State of California on January 24, 1919:

Whereas the Legislature of the State of California, by joint resolution at its last session, urged upon the Congress of the United States the passage of the amendment to the National Constitution known as the Federal suffrage amendment as a matter of justice to the women of our Nation who have labored and sacrificed side by side with the men in the world struggle for liberty and democracy; and

Whereas said Federal suffrage amendment has been passed by the House of Representatives and now awaits the action of the Senate: Be it therefore

Resolved, That profoundly appreciative of the dignity and ability with which the women of this State have used their right to the ballot and so more than ever cognizant that sex discrimination in the granting of the franchise has no place in modern civilization, and realizing as never before how entirely the welfare of our Nation depends upon the material, moral, and spiritual activities of its men and women alike, the Legislature of the State of California urges upon the Senate of the United States at once to pass the Federal suffrage amendment that it may be submitted to the legislatures of the various States, to the end that before the next presidential election the Nation's women may enter upon the rights and duties of the franchise on the same basis as its men.

JOSEPH A. BEEK,
Secretary of the Senate, State of California.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 3384. An act to amend the public-building act, approved March 4, 1913; and

S. 5318. An act granting a pension to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 14746. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920;

H. R. 14894. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 14945. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The message further transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life, character, and public services of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 41. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Yellowstone, Mont., for hotel and other purposes;

S. 2552. An act to provide for a leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods, and for longer times; and

H. R. 12881. An act to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OLYMPIA, WASH., January 23, 1919.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted by the Legislature of the State of Washington, Victor Zednick, secretary:

"Senate joint resolution No. 3, relating to compensation of discharged soldiers and sailors.

"Whereas the members of the Legislature of the State of Washington feel that this Nation owes to its soldiers and sailors of the late war an everlasting debt of gratitude which financial aid can never repay; but

"Whereas they believe that there is justly due to these men who have made such noble sacrifices a greater measure of financial aid than provided for by existing laws: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, That we do earnestly request the Congress of the United States to enact appropriate legislation granting to each honorably discharged soldier and sailor all his uniform and clothing issued by the United States and expense of returning to his home and a bonus of $300, and that your honorable body enact suitable legislation providing appropriate governmental agencies through which soldiers and sailors may secure employment; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the Congress of the United States."

"Passed the senate January 20, 1919.

"LOUIS F. HART, President.

"Passed the house January 21, 1919.

"FRED A. ADAMS, Speaker."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Senate joint memorial No. 3.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that:

Whereas the Government of the United States required war equipment and supplies which could not be produced without chromite; and

Whereas the urgent need for ships for military purposes cut off the supplies from abroad, upon which this country previously had depended; and

Whereas the Government, through its departments and war boards at Washington, advertised this great need for chromite by issuing circulars, bulletins, and letters urging the people to search for, to mine, and to deliver chromite ore; and

Whereas a large number of Oregon miners, most of whom are men of small means, responded freely to these Government advertisements by building roads and trails, making open cuts, and otherwise developing chrome mines and preparing to furnish this mineral to the Government, and who will be financially ruined unless relief comes immediately; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to supplement an act of Congress approved October 5, 1918 (Public, No. 220), and to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, from the funds appropriated by said act, to determine, to adjust, and pay losses sustained by investments preparatory to production of war minerals mentioned in said act": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House concurring), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon favor the enactment by Congress of Senate bill 5234, and to that end the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the United States from the State of Oregon are hereby urged to use their influence in behalf of the passage of said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the Senate of Oregon be directed to transmit by mail a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Oregon in Congress.

Adopted by the house January 20, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 16, 1919.

W. J. VINTON,
President of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WASHINGTON,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, I. M. Howell, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 2 with the original copy of said senate joint memorial No. 2, now on file in this office, and find the same to be a full, true, and correct copy of said original, and of the whole thereof, together with all official indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Washington. Done at the capitol at Olympia this 15th day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.]

I. M. HOWELL,
Secretary of State.
By J. GRANT HINKLE,
Assistant Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial 2.

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

Whereas the Nation has recently lost its foremost statesman and the world one of its greatest men.

Therefore for the purpose of perpetuating his name and memory we, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, memorialize the Congress of the United States and request that the name of the "Panama Canal" be changed to "Roosevelt Canal."

Passed the senate January 13, 1919. LOUIS F. HART, President.

Passed the house January 13, 1919. FRED A. ADAMS, Speaker.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit for printing in the RECORD a communication from the secretary of state of the State of Florida, transmitting resolutions adopted by the legislature of that State. The resolutions are as follows:

House concurrent resolution 9.

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States, inviting attention to the propriety of the improvement by the Federal Government of the St. Lucie Canal, Lake Okeechobee, Caloosahatchee Canal and River, comprising a waterway across Florida from the Atlantic to the Gulf for navigation purposes.

Whereas the United States by act of Congress September 28, 1850, granted to the State of Florida certain swamp and overflowed lands for the purpose of their drainage and reclamation; and

Whereas among the lands so granted under the act aforesaid are the Everglades of Florida and certain contiguous territory which has by legislative enactment of the State of Florida been created and incorporated into the Everglades drainage district for the purpose of constructing canals, ditches, drains, controlling works, levees, and other works of drainage and reclamation within said Everglades drainage district; and

Whereas a part of such drainage works comprises the St. Lucie Canal, with its controlling works, and the Caloosahatchee Canal, with its controlling works, the first connecting Lake Okeechobee and the Atlantic Ocean and the second connecting Lake Okeechobee via Caloosahatchee River with the Gulf of Mexico, providing a continuous water route from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico; and

Whereas by reason of the dimensions of the canal for drainage purposes there is incident a valuable navigation feature when properly harmonized, which said feature of navigation is being as far as practicable developed coincidently with drainage; and

Whereas it is anticipated that the navigation feature through the channels above mentioned, to wit, the St. Lucie Canal, Lake Okeechobee, Caloosahatchee Canal, together with the Caloosahatchee River, will provide a navigable route of increasing value, which will be well worth enlarging and improving for the purpose of developing a larger and broader navigation across said State and connecting the Atlantic Ocean with the Gulf of Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida in session assembled, this 3d day of December, 1918, That the advisability and practicability of enlarging and increasing the navigable depth of the channels being constructed by the State above mentioned be brought before the Federal Government, and that such waterways be, and the same are hereby, recommended proper as objects of improvement and development by the Federal Government of the navigable waters of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to investigate the fitness of the waterways above mentioned for improvement and development, and the Congress be requested to make available such moneys as in its judgment may be required for the purpose aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be placed in the hands of all the members of the Florida delegation in the Congress of the United States, and that they be, and they are hereby, requested to use their best efforts to accomplish the objects above set forth.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house concurrent resolution No. 9, passed by the special session of the Legislature of Florida, 1918, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 22d day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.]

H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 1.

A concurrent resolution, expressing the thanks of the people of the State of Florida to the President and Congress of the United States, all persons in authority, and to the soldiers and sailors who enlisted in the service of the United States for their participation in the early and successful termination of the great war, and memorializing Congress to take such appropriate action as will result in the prompt return of all soldiers and sailors to civil life:

Whereas the wonderfully successful and early termination of the great war is viewed with great satisfaction by the people of this State; and

Whereas by reason of said successful and early termination of said war the material prosperity of this State and the happiness of her people has been and will be greatly enhanced; and

Whereas it will be to the best interest of this Government to have her soldiers and sailors now in service return to civil life at as early a date as possible; and

Whereas all classes of people of this Nation have greatly contributed to the success of the war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the thanks of the people of this State are now tendered to the President of the United States, all Members of Congress, and all persons in authority for their patriotic and sincere endeavors in speeding the war and bringing it to an early and successful conclusion: Be it further

Resolved, That the thanks of the people of this State are also tendered to all Florida men in the military and naval service of the United States, who so bravely risked their lives in behalf of the freedom of the world and the peace of mankind. The traditions of this State have been upheld by them in an incomparable manner, and no words of praise can overestimate the feeling of appreciation entertained by our people: Be it further

Resolved, That the thanks of this legislature are hereby tendered to all our people who remained at home and yet who did such valiant work in behalf of the Government and the prosecution of the war, in connection with the organized movements of the Red Cross, Knights of Columbus, Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, and all kindred organizations: Be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States and all persons in authority be, and they are hereby, petitioned to take such appropriate action as will result in the return to civil life all of the soldiers and sailors now in service as promptly as the same may be done consistently with the public welfare: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States and to Florida Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of house concurrent resolution No. 1, passed at the special session of the Legislature of Florida, 1918, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 17th day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.] H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of sundry citizens of De Soto County, Fla., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the Native Races Anti-Liquor Traffic Committee, commending the proposal of the President of China for the destruction of opium held in that country. The resolutions are very brief, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, January 6, 1919.

At a meeting of the Native Races Anti-Liquor Traffic Committee, held in New York City January 6, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That this committee most heartily commends the proposal of the President of the Republic of China to destroy the opium now held in China, and that the Congress of the United States be asked to tender its congratulations and to offer financial assistance if desired; and that our secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to lay this matter before the proper parties in Congress."

MORNAY WILLIAMS, President.
HERVEY WOOD, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Salem Quarterly Meeting of the Society of Friends, in session at Boston, Mass., praying for the formation of a league of free nations, without the sanction of national armed force, as a part of the treaty of peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Ward Seven Good-Government Association, of Boston, Mass., praying for the establishment of a league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Valladolid Council, No. 70, Knights of Columbus, of Lynn, Mass., favoring freedom of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Malden, Mass., favoring the allowance of a month's pay to discharged soldiers and sailors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Chicopee, Mass., praying for the proposed extension of Federal control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KING presented a memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Utah, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the attached is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint resolution ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes.

Adopted by the Legislature of the State of Utah, as appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 18th day of January, 1919.

[SEAL.] HARDEN BENNION,
Secretary of State.

House joint resolution 1.

Ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes.

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah:

Whereas the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States at the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States of America by Senate joint resolution No. 17, proposed the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to become valid as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by said Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

It is hereby resolved that said amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same is hereby, ratified and adopted by the Legislature of the State of Utah.

It is further resolved that the secretary of state of the State of Utah be, and he is hereby instructed to transmit forthwith to the Secretary of State of the United States of America a certified copy of this resolution.

The foregoing house joint resolution was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the president of the senate, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 16th day of January, 1919.

Secretary of State.

Senate memorial 1.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States, petitioning the Government to pass the Federal suffrage amendment.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Federal amendment to grant the right of suffrage to women equally with men has been before the Congress of the United States for more than 40 years; and

Whereas the women of the nonsuffrage States feel that the time has come when the Congress should give favorable consideration to this measure of justice to one-half the citizens of these United States.

Now, therefore, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that the said suffrage amendment receive immediate and favorable consideration before the sixty-sixth session of Congress adjourns.

The foregoing senate memorial was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the president of the senate, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 16th day of January, 1919.

HARDEN BENNION,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present some resolutions adopted at Evanston, Ill., by parents and next friends of enlisted soldiers and sailors of that city on the question of the distinctive marks proposed. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a public meeting of the parents and next friends of the enlisted soldiers and sailors of the city of Evanston, Ill., on January 12, A. D. 1919, at 4 o'clock p. m., upon motion duly made and unanimously carried, it was declared to be the sense of such meeting that a protest should be entered against the use of any distinguishing insignia between the soldiers and sailors who have served overseas in the present war and those who have rendered service in their own country.

It was thereupon ordered that the undersigned be named as a committee on resolutions to express the sense of such meeting as disclosed by the discussion, and such committee hereby presents the following resolution as expressing the sentiments of such meeting:

"Resolved, That the parents and next friends of all soldiers and sailors from the city of Evanston, Ill., entirely disapprove of any action that may be taken by any officials which tends to draw a distinction between the service of soldiers and sailors who have been overseas and that of those who have served at home. We believe that such action will tend to create discontent and will be accepted by those who were unable to go across as a mark of inferior service. We know that many soldiers and sailors of our city have been anxious to serve at the front or upon the high seas and have been unable to do so through circumstances which they could not control. We know furthermore, that many have been retained in this country because they were efficient in instructing others or in performing more valuable services here than it was probable that they could render abroad, and because it was felt that they were needed here more than they were needed abroad. We firmly believe that an injustice will be done if any distinction is made in the kind of services rendered or where it was rendered by the use of distinguishing insignia or otherwise.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the commanding officials of the military and naval forces of the United States."

Mr. WALSH presented a memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 1.

A memorial to the Senate of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas it appears that a majority of the people of the United States of America are in favor of extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States a measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution designed to effect such extension of suffrage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That we, the members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby petition and earnestly pray the Senate of the United States that such measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution so extending the right of suffrage be passed and submitted to the several States for ratification; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate of the United States, and that copies hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Montana Senators in the Congress of the United States.

President of the Senate pro tempore.

Approved January 23, 1919.

(Signed) S. V. STEWART,
Governor.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, C. T. Stewart, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 1, a memorial to the Senate of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America, enacted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana and approved by S. V. Stewart, governor of said State, this 23d day of January, 1919.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State. Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 23d day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.] C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 2.

Whereas only a small portion of the money contributed from the State of Oregon to the reclamation fund has been expended within the State of Oregon; and

Whereas the Owyhee project in Malheur County, Oreg., has been carefully examined and found from an engineering standpoint to be feasible and practicable and a desirable project, free from difficulties attendant upon many irrigation projects; and

Whereas the Owyhee irrigation district has already been formed and is now prepared to contract with the Reclamation Service for the construction of said project; and

Whereas the people under said project are unitedly in favor of Government aid in securing the reclamation of the lands under said project; and

Whereas the reclamation of the lands within this project will offer an opportunity for the building of homes by the returning soldiers and sailors of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be memorialized to use their influence to secure an appropriation for the construction of said project, and that a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States of America, to each of our Senators and Representatives of the State of Oregon in Congress, and to the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane.

Adopted by the house January 15, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 15, 1919.

W. I. VINTON,
President of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas a measure providing for the submission of a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage is now pending before the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas equal suffrage was adopted in Oregon in November, 1912, and has during its six years of operation proved a complete success in every particular: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Oregon (the House of Representative concurring), That we do heartily indorse equal suffrage and pronounce it an unqualified benefit and success, and we do respectfully request and petition the United States Senate to take favorable and immediate action on the measure now pending before it providing for the submission to the several States of a constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage throughout the United States; and we do urgently petition the members of the Oregon delegation to use their best efforts toward securing the adoption thereof; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the chief clerk of the Oregon Senate to the President and Vice President of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative from Oregon in the United States Congress.

Adopted by the house January 14, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 14, 1919.

President of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. I present a communication from the secretary of the Rotary Club, of Manchester, N. H., embodying resolutions adopted at a meeting of that club relative to the value of improved national highways in the general transportation system of the Nation. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROTARY CLUB.
Manchester, N. H., January 23, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOSES: At a meeting held January 21, 1919, the following resolutions were adopted and are forwarded for your information as an expression of our opinion:

"Whereas the President of the United States in his recent message to Congress recognized the value of improved highways in the general transportation system of the Nation and definitely recommended and urged their rapid development; and

"Whereas this work is necessary to give employment to our returning soldiers and also to furnish worthy projects on which unemployed labor can be engaged during the period of readjustment; and

"Whereas we recognize the necessity for a well-defined and connected system of improved highways in order to expedite the distribution of large volumes of foodstuffs now wasted on account of the lack of prompt and adequate highway transportation, and to better serve the economic and military needs of the Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a Federal highway commission be created to promote and guide this powerful economic development of both highways and highway traffic and establish a national highway system; Be it further

"Resolved, That the present appropriations for Federal aid to the States be continued and increased and the States urged to undertake extensive highway construction so as to keep pace with the development of this country and its transportation needs, and in carrying out the provisions of the present Federal-aid act, or any amendment thereto, that the State highway departments shall cooperate with the Federal highway commission; Be it further

"Resolved, That all governmental activities with respect to highways be administered by the Federal highway commission."

Very truly, yours,

R. C. MARDEN, Secretary.

Mr. COLT presented a resolution adopted by the Rotary Club, of Providence, R. I., favoring the changing of the name of the Panama Canal to Roosevelt Canal, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I present a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., January 26, 1919.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed to wire you the following resolution, enrolled by the Senate of the State of California on January 24, 1919:

"Whereas the Legislature of the State of California, by joint resolution at its last session, urged upon the Congress of the United States the passage of the amendment to the national Constitution known as the Federal suffrage amendment as a matter of justice to the women of our Nation who have labored and sacrificed side by side with the men in the world struggle for liberty and democracy; and

"Whereas said Federal suffrage amendment has been passed by the House of Representatives and now awaits the action of the Senate: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That, profoundly appreciative of the dignity and ability with which the women of this State have used their right to the ballot, and so more than ever cognizant that sex discrimination in the granting of the franchise has no place in modern civilization, and realizing as never before how entirely the welfare of our Nation depends upon the material, moral, and spiritual activities of its men and women alike, the Legislature of the State of California urges upon the Senate of the United States at once to pass the Federal suffrage amendment, that it may be submitted to the legislatures of the various States, to the end that before the next presidential election the Nation's women may enter upon the rights and duties of the franchise on the same basis as its men."

JOSEPH A. BEEK,
Secretary of the Senate.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Nelson	Spencer
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Kellogg	Penrose	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Pittman	Trammell
Curtis	King	Poindexter	Underwood
Fernald	Kirby	Pollock	Vardaman
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh
France	La Follette	Ransdell	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Gay	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams
Harding	McNary	Sherman
Henderson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Hitchcock	Moses	Smoot

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is still detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on official business. This announcement will stand for to-day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BAIRD] on account of illness. I will allow this announcement to stand for the week.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are detained on important public business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered the roll call. There is a quorum present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 665) thereon.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 29) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 668) thereon.

He also, from the same committee to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1607) for the relief of David E. Gray, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 669) thereon.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and I shall submit a report (No. 666) thereon. I will state that the report will be filed this evening, so that it may be printed in the morning.

I give notice that as soon as the special order which is now being considered is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

CARSON INDIAN SCHOOL, STEWART, NEV.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4887) making an appropriation for a sewer system at the Carson Indian School at Stewart, Nev., and I submit a report (No. 663) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a bill to correct an inadvertence. An item in the Indian appropriation act of 1918 was left out of print by the inadvertence of the clerk. It is a matter that must be attended to immediately. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $8,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the United States in the construction and installation of a sewer system at the Carson Indian School at Stewart, in the State of Nevada.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DENIAL OF PATENT TO S. M. HERBER.

Mr. KENYON. I present from the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures a report signed by the chairman. It has been utterly impossible to secure a quorum of the committee. I ask that the report of the chairman, which is short, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (No. 667) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KENYON, from the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures submitted the following report, pursuant to S. Res. 259:

On the 7th day of June, 1918, the Senate passed the following resolution:

"Whereas it is asserted by reliable persons that Mr. S. M. Herber, of St. Joseph, Mo., has discovered a process of extracting from petroleum or fuel oil gasoline and other motor fuel in greatly increased quantities and at much less cost than the process now in use; and

"Whereas the discoverer of the said process has submitted to certain officers of the Government an offer to demonstrate the value of the process to the Government and to the people without expense, other than the presence of such experts as might be selected by the Government; and

"Whereas this offer has not yet been accepted, and there is immediate necessity of increasing the output of motor fuel, and decreasing, if possible, the cost to the users: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures of the Senate be directed to make an investigation of the subject, including the denial of a patent to the said Herber for a process of extracting gasoline from petroleum, and to report to the Senate thereon as soon as practicable the information acquired, and its recommendations with respect to the matter."

It has been impossible to secure the attendance of a quorum of said committee. The chairman has therefore proceeded to hear evidence and presents now a report signed by himself, in no way binding upon the balance of the committee, and asks that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the matter.

The investigation has been limited to the question of the denial of a patent to Mr. Herber for a process for extracting gasoline from petroleum. While the resolution covered the general subject as to the value of said process, no evidence with relation thereto has been furnished.

The work of the committee has been especially difficult, as the questions involved are intricate and relate to the administration of the patent laws and the rules of the Patent Office. The question is difficult to be understood by those who are not experienced on the subject, and the committee has not had the benefit of an expert patent attorney to present the matter.

Further, some of the parties who should know the facts are dead or beyond the reach of the committee.

Mr. Herber claims that a patent was unlawfully denied to him on his application, No. 91447, filed April 15, 1916, and that a patent was illegally issued to John Coast, jr., on Coast's application, No. 127128, filed the 23d day of October, 1916, Herber claiming that the Coast application covered identically the same process. Herber also claims that certain rules of the Patent Office were not carried out, reference to which will be made later on. Also that certain patents known as the Forward, Daul, and Strain patents were illegally and improperly brought forward in order to prevent his securing his patent. In other words, Herber's claims are an indictment of the Patent Office for illegal action depriving him of an invention of great value and bestowing the same upon Coast.

II.

Herber's claims were rejected by Examiner Ely, now dead, November 10, 1916. Said examiner therein made reference to the Daul and Strain patents. This letter of Examiner Ely was as follows:

[W. T. Fitz Gerald & Co., Washington, D. C. Samuel M. Herber. No. 91447. Filed Apr. 15, 1916.]

METHOD OF SEPARATING OIL.

This case as amended November 3 has been considered.

The following additional patents are made of record: Daul, 258284, May 23, 1882, 196–5; Strain, 298712, May 13, 1884, 196–2; Strain, 311543, February 3, 1885, 196–27.

In view of the additional references the previously allowed claims are rejected, being fully met by any of these patents in view of the previous references in the case, the patent to Forward disclosing cracking and distillation by steam. It appears also that cracking would be produced in either Strain, which is necessarily under same pressure; and further, that the pressure in the system could be regulated by the various cocks.

The claims in the case are rejected.

ELY, Examiner.

A.M. P.

Subsequently thereto, namely, November 13, 1916, Herber's attorneys asked for a reconsideration calling attention of the examiner to the fact that Forward's application was copending with the Herber application, having been filed on May 15, 1915, and patented June 27, 1916. Mr. Herber's application was filed on April 15, 1916, and if there was anything in conflict between these applications an interference should have been declared.

On November 17 Examiner Ely filed an additional opinion in which nothing, however, was said, about an interference, and the claims were finally rejected. Herber then appealed from this finding to the examiners in chief, they holding (p. 30, transcript of the record, Exhibit A) that the claims of Herber were anticipated by the Forward patent and accordingly affirmed the examiner's decision.

Herber then appealed from this to the Commissioner of Patents, and on March 12, 1917, the Commissioner of Patents, Mr. Thomas Ewing, filed his opinion sustaining the examiners in chief. Referring to the Herber process (p. 37, transcript of the record), he said:

"The most that can be said is that they differ from the Forward process in the substitution of one well-known way of heating the oil for another."

Herber then appealed to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The matter was there heard, and the court filed its opinion June 2, 1917, sustaining the Commissioner of Patents. Among others this language is used:

"After careful consideration of appellant's brief in connection with the record, we have reached the conclusion that the decision of the commissioner should be affirmed, and upon the ground stated by him. In other words, we are fully satisfied that the Forward patent, No. 1,189083, of June 27, 1916, is a complete anticipation of appellant's claims.

"The decision is affirmed.

"CHAS. H. ROBB, Associate Justice."

I have sketched briefly the progress of this matter through the courts, and it seems to me that the last decision determined adversely Herber's claim to a patent on his process, unless said decision is in some way set aside. Under rule 94 or 96 of the Patent Office, it seems to me an interference should have been declared between Herber's application and the Forward application or the Forward patent. It should be stated as an interesting matter of fact that in a letter of November 10 from the Patent Office to Herber appear these words:

"In view of the additional reference the previously allowed claims are rejected."

Herber felt that this letter was an indication that his claims had been previously allowed. There is no record to show this, but the wording of the letter naturally aroused his suspicion.

However, under the decision of the court, as before referred to, it must stand as an adjudicated fact that Herber had no right to a patent upon his processes as presented in his application.

III.

THE COAST PATENT.

Coast filed his claim on the 23d day of October, 1916. Herber claims in his testimony that this process and his process are identical. Mr. Newton, present commissioner (pp. 151–152 of the record) states that Coast claimed a different invention from what Herber did. Therefore he says they allowed Coast's claims and refused Herber's claims.

Further, it is stated by the commissioner that they tried to have Herber declare an interference with Coast.

It had been before decided, as set forth in division 2 hereof, that Herber's claims had been held to be nonpatentable. That being true, I fail to understand how there could be any right to an interference between the Coast claims and the Herber claims. It is the theory of the Patent Office that Herber could have made the same claims as Coast and in that way thrown them into interference, and it could have been determined who was the first inventor. Herber claims such interference should have been under rule 94, the Patent Office claiming it should have been under rule 96.

I am unable to state from my examination and from listening to the evidence whether or not the Coast claims are exactly identical with the Herber claims. Certainly they are very much alike.

Further, Herber filed an affidavit under the rules of the Patent Office after the time of Coast's filing and before the Coast patent was issued. He claims that this would, under the rule, prevent the issuance of the Coast patent until the matter was tried out.

While technically there could be no interference between the Coast patent and the Herber claims, as the last had been held to be nonpatentable, yet in making a new claim slightly different, I assume the two could have been thrown into interference. And it would seem as if this should have been done without heckling over the technical method of bringing it about. This is a perplexity, however, that the committee is unable to solve.

That there was fraud practiced by the Patent Office can not be assumed. Fraud must be clearly shown and not derived from inferences, unless the inferences are incompatible with the theory of good faith.

These things seem to be true: Herber filed an application for process that he felt would be of great value. The Forward patent was issued after Herber filed his application. The Coast patent was issued on substantially the same matter as the Herber patent months after Herber filed his application. The Coast patent was issued after Herber had filed an affidavit, as provided by the rules of the Patent Office, setting forth that his process had been in existence before the time of the Coast application.

It seems to me there should have been an interference between the Herber patent and the Forward patent, so the question of priority of invention could have been determined.

It further seems that the patent should not have been issued to Coast until there had been some determination of the priority of invention in the claims then being made by Herber and set forth in his affidavit.

The matter is so intricate and the hearings have been so unsatisfactory it would seem to the chairman it would be wise if the whole matter could be opened up by the Patent Office and a new hearing granted. I addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Patents along that line, but he seems to think it is impossible after the lapse of time to grant a rehearing. I make no recommendation as to the action that Congress should take in this matter and I do not discuss remedies for this unfortunate situation. I think the evidence presented, however, is sufficient to warrant some action on the part of Congress. Whether Congress could set aside the Forward patent or the Coast patent, I am not prepared to say. I do feel very strongly that if there is any legal way that Congress may again open the door for Mr. Herber to present his claims, he should have the opportunity of doing so.

The records and papers are returned to this body with the request that the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures be discharged from further consideration of the subject.

WM. S. KENYON, Chairman.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 5433) to provide for certain commissions and promotions in the military service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment authorizing certain persons formerly connected with the American Embassy at Berlin to accept pieces of plate presented to them by the British Government, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000,000 to resume and prosecute work on projects and units thereof under the reclamation act stopped during the war, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOSES submitted an amendment relative to clerks and messengers to Senate committees, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment relative to the establishment of a home or homes for aged and infirm colored people and working girls in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, was on Friday last made the unfinished business and is to be considered. The purpose of that bill is to validate certain informal contracts, and I have an amendment which I intend to propose to it which looks more particularly to the protection of subcontractors. I ask that the amendment may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Insert the following:

Whenever, under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War shall make an award to any prime contractor who shall have sublet any part of said contract for material, equipment, or supplies to any other person, firm, or corporation who has in good faith made expenditures, incurred obligations, rendered service, or furnished material, equipment, or supplies to any prime contractor, with the knowledge and approval of any agent of the Secretary of War duly authorized thereunto, the Secretary of War shall apportion the amount of said award justly due to each of the subcontractors of said prime contractors. Before payment of said award the Secretary of War shall require any prime contractor to present satisfactory evidence of having paid said subcontractors or of the consent of said subcontractors to look for their compensation to said prime contractor only; and in the case of the failure of said prime contractor to present such evidence or such consent, the Secretary of War shall pay directly to said subcontractors the amount found to be due under said award; and in case of the insolvency of any prime contractor the subcontractor of said prime contractor shall have a lien upon the funds arising from said award prior and superior to the lien of any general creditors of said prime contractor.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF CABLES.

Mr. WATSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 429), which was read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the assumption by the Government of the supervision, possession, control, or operation of any or all of the telegraph, telephone, and marine cable systems; the reasons for such assumption; the financial results of governmental operation, and the effects of Government control on the efficiency of such systems, and report to the Senate of the United States its findings and conclusions thereon.

Such committee is authorized to subpœna witnesses and documents, administer oaths, and to do all acts and things necessary to the carrying out of the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, on January 2 I submitted a resolution for the investigation of telegraphs, telephones, and cables, but it embodies a great deal more than the resolution which has just been submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. The resolution introduced by me has been lying on the table, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

AGNES KELLEY.

Mr. THOMPSON. On behalf of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is necessarily absent from the Senate because of an injury as the result of an accident, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 427) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Agnes Kelley, widow of John N. Kelley, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

COMPLAINT OF E. L. RICE.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 428), which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the report of the Inspector General made to the Secretary of War, on or about October 1, 1918, in the matter of the complaint of E. L. Rice with respect to Lieut. Col. Robert A. Milliken, Col. C. H. Hilton, and Lieut. D. L. Webster, and others.

TRIALS BY COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. BORAH. I offer a Senate resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it be immediately considered.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution be read for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 426), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the number of individuals who have been tried and convicted by court-martial proceedings since our entrance into the war, April 6, 1917, together with a brief statement of the offense charged and the nature and extent of the punishment inflicted upon or assessed against each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING DEVICES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit a Senate resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 425) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether or not Title LII, Revised Statutes, for the regulation of steam vessels, as amended and supplemented, is being enforced as respects life-saving devices, designating the character of such devices, if any, as are not being required for such vessels, and why not so required; and whether or not the steam cargo and passenger vessels owned, operated, or controlled by the United States Shipping Board and by the Emergency Fleet Corporation are equipped with the life-saving devices described in that title, as amended and supplemented, and why they are not so equipped, if that be the case.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 30th of December last I submitted a resolution seeking certain information relative to the granting of commissions after the signing of the armistice to enlisted men who had been recommended for commissions prior to the signing of the armistice. Subsequently this resolution was adopted. The Secretary of War, responding to the resolution, has transmitted a report to the President of the Senate. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one of my colleagues suggests that it be read. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 18, 1919.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of a resolution of the Senate dated January 3, 1919, which reads as follows:

"Whereas prior to the signing of the armistice a large number of enlisted men in the Army had been recommended for commissions and many officers had been recommended for promotion, and such recommendations were pending in the War Department when said armistice was signed; and

"Whereas an order was issued by the Secretary of War which resulted in no action being taken upon said recommendations or either of them; and

"Whereas officers and enlisted men who were so recommended are being discharged from the service without said recommendations being acted upon; and

"Whereas no good and sufficient reason appears for failure to act upon said recommendations, and justice and good faith would seem to require affirmative action thereon: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate whether a modification or revocation of said order is contemplated; and if not, what reasons exist for failing to act upon said recommendations."

I have the honor to report as follows:

Appointments to any commissioned grade in the United States Army have been made, and can properly be made, only when vacancies exist. Immediately upon the conclusion of the armistice, November 11, 1918, the demobilization of the temporary army was begun and has been proceeding with great rapidity. From and after that date, therefore, instead of there being any vacancies in any grade there has been a surplus of officers in every grade, which it has been necessary to reduce by discharge. To increase the surplus by further appointments would have been unjustifiable, and such appointments were therefore discontinued. As it is necessary to continue the discharge of officers at the rate of more than 1,000 a day, it is not contemplated to resume appointments.

In connection with the suggestion which is frequently made that commissions be conferred upon those persons who had been recommended for them prior to the signing of the armistice, in order that on their discharge they may carry with them into civil life the title of a higher rank, the department has consistently adhered to the views that a military office, like any other, should be conferred only with a view to the performance of the duties pertaining to it, and that when there is no expectation that a person will perform the duties of an office, civil or military, appointment to such office can with difficulty be justified. No change in this policy is contemplated.

There is a certain class of military office, however, to which no present duties are attached, but whose purpose is to place the holder in such a position that under certain circumstances the Government may require his services. I refer to the Officers' Reserve Corps. Appointment in this corps is properly conferred upon those from whom no immediate services are required, and such appointment carries with it office, rank, and title in the United States Army. Immediately after the conclusion of the armistice, I directed that a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps be offered to every enlisted man who had been properly recommended during the war as qualified for such commission. I further directed that in every case where an officer had been duly recommended for promotion he be offered a reserve commission with the rank for which recommended. Under the present law appointments in the Officers' Reserve Corps are restricted to certain grades and certain limitations are imposed as to the age of appointees. I expect to transmit to Congress in the near future my recommendations for amendment of this law, which will make it possible to offer to every officer who has served in the war a reserve commission in the grade for which he has been found qualified.

The matter may briefly be summed up as follows: The demobilization of the Army makes it impossible to employ any additional officers on active duty, but, on the contrary, necessitates the discharge of many already in the service. For officers not on active duty, but held in reserve, the need will always exist in time of peace. The War Department, therefore, has discontinued the appointment of officers for active duty, but offers to every man who has been found qualified for it a commission in the United States Army with inactive status.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, several days ago I submitted a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, calling for certain information from the State Department as to what policy it would pursue in regard to the claims presented by American citizens against the Republic of Mexico for damages sustained to their property, as well as for damages claimed because of injuries to persons and because of the death of certain American citizens. The committee, through the chairman, promised to report that resolution at an early date. I understand that some consideration has been given to it, and I hope it will be reported at the next meeting of the committee.

Since then I have received a letter from Mr. Malcolm S. Little, a gentleman whom I know, a reputable lawyer of Los Angeles, in which he calls attention to a bill now pending in the legislative body of the State of Sonora, which has for its object the confiscation of more than 10,000,000 acres of land belonging to American citizens in that State. The letter is a very instructive one upon the situation. He invites attention to the wrongs and injuries to which American citizens have been subjected. He transmits with his letter a copy of the pending bill, translated into the English language. I shall not ask that the translation of the bill be printed in the RECORD; but I request that the letter which I have received from Mr. Little be printed in the RECORD, and that the letter and the translation of the proposed measure be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., January 4, 1919.

Hon. W. H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I notice from a Washington dispatch a purported interview with you concerning the Mexican situation, and am therefore taking the liberty of handing you herewith a translation of a bill now pending in the Legislature of the State of Sonora, Mexico, providing for the enforced subdivision and sale of all lands in said State in excess of the maximum areas which owners will be permitted to retain, as established in article 15 of the proposed law. A hectare is equivalent to 2.47 acres.

American citizens and American-owned corporations hold in fee in the State of Sonora approximately 10,000,000 acres of land, most of which has been held 20 years or more, and were acquired in every case, so far as my information goes—and I am familiar with the titles to all the larger tracts—by purchase from citizens of Mexico for cash consideration, in compliance with all legal requirements in force at the time and under the guaranties furnished by the constitution of the State and Federal Governments.

Under this bill, if enacted into law, owners of land must at their own expense subdivide them in the manner directed by the State, subject to their expropriation, subdivision, and sale by the State if they refuse so to do. The price at which the owners shall be paid is the declared value of the land for purpose of taxation, plus 30 per cent thereof and the cost of subdivision, if the subdivision is made by the owners, or plus only 10 per cent of such value if the lands are taken by expropriation proceedings. The price thus determined shall be paid by the Mexicans to whom the lands are distributed in 20 annual installments, beginning two years from the date on which they are subjected to use, with interest at 5 per cent per annum. The law does not provide for a vendor's lien on the lands, the State in no way secures payment of the purchase price, and the only remedy of the present owners would be against the individual distributees, mostly poor peons, of whom there would be thousands in some cases, and who would be protected by the homestead act.

This is merely a bald attempt to disguise confiscation.

During the last five years American property owners have been constantly harassed by the military government, their goods and crops have been destroyed or appropriated without compensation, and some of their property has been sold under tax decrees issued by the military by an assumption of legislative powers.

The larger American companies that were thus unjustly treated first protested to the Sonora State Government, without effect, then to the Federal Government under Mr. Carranza, with like results, and next to the American Government. I understand our State Department has made representations to Carranza against such unwarranted treatment, but with no apparent effect on the Sonora government, which long ago became obdurate in the pursuit of its own policy to appropriate foreign-owned lands, regardless of protests and diplomatic representations. This proposed law is the culmination of this policy and likewise the fruit of the forbearance of the American Government in the face of the exploitation of the properties of its citizens, a course, no doubt, heretofore justified by other considerations, but which, however, has been interpreted by the Mexicans as weakness.

This law, if enacted, will affect foreigners, principally Americans, almost exclusively, since most of the Mexicans who owned any considerable area of land have been held to be enemies of the revolution, exiled, and their properties seized and in some cases subdivided and distributed to revolutionists.

Sonora is not an isolated case, but is merely typical of what is being done or will be done in many of the other 26 States and Territories if a halt is not called in a manner the Mexicans can not fail to understand.

The great body of the Mexican people are honest, hard-working, and industrious, the same as any other people, and only want a chance to live and better their circumstances in an orderly, just way, but they are now dominated, more to their injury than to ours, by a relatively small Bolshevik element.

As counsel for Americans and American-owned corporations holding about 6,000,000 acres of land in Sonora, I most earnestly implore your consideration of this matter. If we can not get effective and immediate help from the American Government, these enormous investments will be lost.

Respectfully, yours,

M. C. LITTLE.

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM RUSSIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I wish to give notice to the Senate that on Wednesday next I am going to ask leave to call up the resolution which has heretofore been introduced by me asking for an expression of opinion by the Senate of the United States that our troops be withdrawn from Russia. I will speak to the subject at that time.

FOOD PRODUCTION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Post of this morning, a statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover, which seems to be such a complete reply to all the criticisms that have been lately uttered that I ask leave, without taking up the time of the Senate to read it, to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AID FARMERS, HE SAYS—HOOVER DECLARES PROBLEM OF FOOD PRODUCTION SERIOUS—WORLD WILL NEED IT ALL—SERIOUS THINKING REQUIRED TO PREVENT PRICES FALLING BELOW A FAIR RETURN DURING THE TRANSITION PERIOD BEFORE SIGNING OF PEACE, THEREAFTER ECONOMIC LAW TO RULE.

PARIS, January 26.

Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator and director general of the international relief organization, gave out the following statement to-day:

"The dominating food problem in the United States at this moment is a very much bigger problem than the Chicago packers. It is a problem of the American farmer.

"If the packer's profit of 2 or 3 cents on his turnover is too high, it is the duty of Congress to tax it out of him. If the farmers' prices threaten to fall below the level of a fair return, it behooves the country to do some quick, clear thinking.

"The perplexities arising out of inability to demobilize totally the food situation of the world in the period between the armistice and peace make the farmers' position in the matter of much more immediate concern than the future of the Chicago packers.

ARMISTICE CHANGED SITUATION.

"Taking it broadly, before the European war began we exported about 5,000,000 tons of food a year. This year we are prepared to export at the rate of from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 tons. The increase represents the patriotic service of the American farmer, plus the voluntary sacrifice of the average American under the stimulation of the pleas from the allied governments that without an enormous increase in our food supplies their very lives would be menaced.

"The submarine had so shortened the world's shipping that the allies were unable to reach the distant markets of the Southern Hemisphere, and we were bound to create in America sufficient food to carry Europe. If the war had gone on, every pound of it and more would have been required by the allies before next harvest.

"The armistice came suddenly, freeing shipping from military use and reopening to the allies the cheaper Southern Hemisphere and the colonial markets, where, in addition, they could have more liberal credits and markets for their manufactures.

IMMEDIATE PROBLEM SERIOUS.

"We are thus faced with a serious problem with respect to our own great supplies, patriotically accumulated. If an early peace is signed and the markets of Europe are opened freely to trade, there will be a greater demand for food from the new mouths than even this surplus could supply. But in the period between the armistice and peace we have a very difficult situation.

"One of the most critical food shortages in the world was that of fats, and the only help lay in an increase in the American hog. Our Agriculture Department and the Food Administration spared no efforts to stimulate this production. Our farmers were assured that in the general shortage, subject only to the uncertainties of war, they would experience no difficulty in marketing their production. Due to the savings of our people and the gradual increased production of our farms, we have lifted our ability to export from 50,000,000 pounds of fats per month in the summer of 1917 to 400,000,000 pounds per month in this January.

"To achieve this mobilization of fats it was necessary to mobilize the packers as well as the farmers. There is no doubt that the vast volume of business brought profit to the packers, although at a less percentage than before the Food Administration took charge of it.

HOW PRICES WERE STABILIZED.

"The allied nations, in order to effect regular supplies to their people in the face of short shipping, and to provide for government rationing, were compelled to take over the entire purchase of these food supplies and thereby abandon the ordinary flow of trade and commerce. In consequence, they concentrated their buying through agencies, and the power of these buying agencies was so great that they controlled the price.

"The business of the Food Administration was to bring these buying agents, the representatives of the farmers, who are predominatingly interested, and the great and small packers together and see to it that a square deal was obtained all around. The prices were settled in a joint conference of the farmers, the representatives of the allies' buyers, and the great and small packers, under the general arrangement that the packer was allowed but a quarter of a cent a pound over and above the price to the farmer and the cost of raw material and labor for packing. The allies took the entire surplus.

CHANGE CAME OVERNIGHT.

"The situation changed overnight with the armistice. The allies are not only seeking the southern hemisphere markets, but they had also lately accumulated large stocks of fats as an insurance against the submarine menace. Freed from this menace and with the shortage of finance experienced by all Governments, together with the loss in the storage of commodities by deterioration, there is a natural desire on their part to reduce their stocks.

"Other factors have entered into the situation. For instance, the inactive armies and munition workers are consuming less fats, and the vegetable is freed for human consumption. This came upon us immediately with the armistice in early November, in the midst of our heaviest hog-marketing season, which lasts from October until March. When I left home for Europe in November this problem was already facing me as one among many others for which assistance had to be found, in the protection of our American farmer, lest from failure to find a market for his products during the armistice and pending the wider markets of peace his prices might fall below his cost of production, entailing great waste of surplus commodities.

PROTECTION FOR THE FARMER.

"We have found it possible to protect the American farmer in the two and a half months since the armistice. This we have done by cooperating with the allies, in opening wider markets to neutral countries, and by relief shipments into the liberated territories. The next and last six weeks of the high fat-production season will be still more difficult to manage, as peace can not be expected in that time, restoring extended markets.

"On the other hand, five-sixths of this problem is already completed, and by next May, if we have peace and freedom, any surplus that accumulates now will be turned into another world shortage of fats. Indeed, if the entire consuming populations of the world were able to obtain fats to-day, there would be a shortage at this moment, even with our great surplus production.

"Numerous solutions have been proposed. It has been considered that the allied governments should continue to purchase the surplus production of pork products, despite the accumulated stocks and lack of immediate need, and thus protect the American farmer against the surplus provided especially for them. It has been contended that they are under moral obligations to execute the forecasts of their requirements given from time to time through their various agencies.

ALLIES FACE OWN PROBLEMS.

"The allies can, however, contend that they also have great problems of excess production in commodities, such as munitions, which they have likewise produced under war pressure. They contend that we have jointly fought and won the war; that this is sudden and catches us all with a vast production, which must be faced and liquidated by each of us without undue pressure, one against the other; that they, like ourselves, are entering a period of large employment during the readjustment, and that their people, like ours, need lower food prices.

"The real solution lies in the hope of early peace, and in the meantime the steady demobilization of all restrictions on free marketing of surplus foods except in enemy territory, thus reestablishing the law of supply and demand.

"Practically all restrictions on American food exports have been removed. Progress has been made in lifting neutral blockade restrictions, and further relaxations of blockade measures are under earnest consideration. The readjustment of consolidated buying agencies is hoped for in order that merchants may enter upon trade freely on both sides, and thus secure a normal basis of price determining without any dominating influences.

"It is, however, no more possible to demobilize in a week the whole of these intricate forces set up during the war than it is to demobilize our Army by dismissing it on the field. And pending these solutions our American farmers, merchants, packers, and banks simply must stand together for two or three months to carry our excess surplus over until the markets of the world have been more extended and finally liberated by peace. The meeting of farmers' and packers' representatives called at Chicago on Tuesday has to consider these problems."

DISCHARGE OF MEDICAL OFFICERS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there has been considerable criticism of the War Department for failure to discharge soldiers and sailors who were indispensably needed at home. There has been a great deal of criticism pertaining to the discharge of surgeons and physicians who are in the Army. I have received a communication from Surg. Gen. Ireland. I think it is so important that it ought to go in the RECORD, at least. It will be very instructive, or at least illuminating, to Senators. I shall not ask that it be read, but I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 20, 1919.

Senator WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reference to your inquiry as to the reason why the Medical Department is not making more rapid progress in the discharge of medical officers, the department begs to submit the following statement:

There are in the military hospitals in the United States at the present time 66,529 occupied beds. In military hospitals in France there are 120,000 sick and wounded soldiers, of whom between 65,000 and 75,000 are expected to be sent to this country for further hospital treatment. In addition to the above, the Medical Department is, of course, called upon to care for the usual number of sick and injured resulting day by day in an army of 1,000,000 men in the United States. Many of the cases now in this country and of those to arrive from France are soldiers who have been seriously wounded and will need the most expert care to prevent deformity or other permanent disability. It should also be borne in mind that demobilization itself adds to the burdens of the Medical Department, as a large staff of medical men must be provided in each camp to make the required physical examinations of men about to be discharged.

When the armistice was signed on November 11, the department had on duty in this country approximately 16,000 medical officers. Between that date and January 18, 1919, 7,851, or nearly half, of these officers have been discharged from the service.

The large number of medical men still in the service from civil life and the increased amount of sickness prevailing throughout the United States this year has resulted in inconvenience and distress in many local communities. The department fully appreciated this situation and has discharged many officers whose services it could ill afford to lose in order that community needs might be partially met. The Surgeon General must, however, keep constantly in mind that his first responsibility is to provide the soldiers of the United States Army with proper and adequate professional care and to restore those who have been disabled or mutilated to the best possible functional condition before they are discharged from the service.

The fact that the war is presumably over and that there is no longer any prospect of overseas service or of promotion has naturally led to a reaction and a decline in morale among both officers and enlisted men retained against their will for service in our hospitals. Unless the public supports the department in retaining the personnel essential to its continued operation, this unrest will increase and must eventually react on the quality of service rendered the patients.

Your influence and support are earnestly requested in satisfying the people in your State of the continued need of the Army for the services of their medical men.

The fact that medical officers at certain places are for the moment not fully occupied should not be considered as evidence that their services are no longer required, as the peak of the load from overseas has not yet been reached and may not be reached in less than two or three months from date.

Yours, sincerely, M. W. IRELAND,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

MILITARY TRIALS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that an article which appeared in the New York World with reference to military trials may be printed in the RECORD, because it is in direct connection with the speech made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on that subject.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York World, Jan. 19, 1919.]

THE THING THAT IS CALLED MILITARY JUSTICE—CONCRETE OFFICIAL EVIDENCE WHICH ESTABLISHES THAT UNITED STATES MILITARY COURTS-MARTIAL INDORSE AND APPROVE OF OPPRESSION AND ARBITRARILY IMPOSE GROSS INJUSTICE—WHENCE COMES THE LAW WHICH MAKES THIS POSSIBLE? FROM CONGRESS—IT HAS ITS ORIGIN IN MEDIEVAL TIMES, BUT ITS BLUNDERING HARSHNESS NO LONGER OBTAINS IN FRANCE, ENGLAND, ITALY, OR BELGIUM—DATA FOUND IN THE 1918 RECORDS IN WASHINGTON, TO WHICH ACCESS WAS HAD BY THE AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION ACTS—BILL IN SENATE.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN's sensational speech arraigning the administration of justice in the United States Army brought this subject to the attention of the country. Before the Senate on December 30 the Oregon statesman, who is chairman of that body's Committee on Military Affairs, declared that we do not administer military justice according to law, but that it is completely under the control of military commanders who are not obliged to ask for legal advice or to follow it if given them by the responsible law officers of the Army. He cited instance after instance of soldiers sentenced to terms of from 2 to 25 years' imprisonment for comparatively trivial breaches of military discipline.

On January 3 President George T. Page brought the subject of military courts-martial to the attention of the executive committee of the American Bar Association. He denounced the obsolete procedure, the harsh and unequal punishments, and declared that the system was unworthy of the name of law or justice. The committee recorded its conclusions in the following resolution:

That the matter of the administration of military justice in the United States Army be referred to the program committee of this body for its determination as to whether and how it shall be made a part of the program for our annual session, with the accompanying pronouncement that in the opinion of this committee our military law and our system of administering military justice appeals to us as a subject which requires consideration and probably some reformation.

The information set forth on this page was obtained by Rowland Thomas, a member of the World editorial staff, who was sent to Washington to investigate the conditions exposed by Senator CHAMBERLAIN and President Page. He was authorized by Secretary of War Baker to examine the records in the Judge Advocate's office and there found full verification of the conditions that had aroused the indignation of these officials.

On the 13th instant Senator CHAMBERLAIN introduced in the Senate a bill to redraft the laws governing military courts-martial so as to afford protection to soldiers accused by their commanding officers and to stop the imposition of heavy penalties for trivial offenses.

(By Rowland Thomas.)

In November, 1917, twelve old and excellent noncommissioned officers of the United States Army were tried by general court-martial at a camp in Texas. The charge was mutiny, a military offense so grave that the punishment prescribed in the Articles of War is "death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

These men had been engaged in a camp amusement prohibited by a standing order. A young officer, finding them thus occupied and being overquick to assert his authority, ordered them in arrest instead of contenting himself with an admonition. While the men were in arrest he ordered them to drill. That order was in conflict with a general Army regulation which directs that noncommissioned officers in arrest shall attend no formations. The 12 noncoms knew that, and declined to put themselves in the position of violating a general regulation.

Upon their respectful refusal to drill they were summarily stripped of their insignia of rank and placed in the guardhouse. The charge of mutiny was preferred against them. They were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment at hard labor for terms ranging from 10 years up to 25. The commanding officer who had appointed the court reviewed and approved its findings and ordered its sentence executed. And from his arbitrary decision the 12 accused had no appeal whatsoever to any judicial power.

These 12 men had been mistried. They were, prima facie, innocent of the crime for which they had been accused and convicted. "Mutiny," by the definition given in the official manual for courts-martial, "imports collective insubordination, and necessarily includes some combination of two or more persons in resisting lawful military authority." These 12 old soldiers had not resisted lawful military authority. On the contrary, the act for which they found themselves "broken" and in penal servitude had been an act of upholding lawful military authority—one of the general regulations of the United States Army—against the infraction of a lawless or ignorant officer of that Army.

The other day I brought this case to the attention of an able and very distinguished member of the American bar. "Considering all those facts," I asked him, "do you see any shading of phrases by which a sane man, lawyer or layman, could seriously refer to any part of that transaction as representing the administration of any sort of justice?"

"On the contrary," was his answer, "what you have cited, were it true, would be a perfect example of the arbitrary imposition of injustice. But do you mean to tell me that happened in our Army?"

"By authority granted me personally by the Secretary of War," I answered him, "I have inspected the legal record of that case. What I have told you is its undisputed substance. The record is in the Mills Building, in the files of what we call our Bureau of Military Justice."

THE BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

The Mills Building is in Washington, just across Seventeenth Street from the State, War, and Navy Building. In it are the offices of the Judge Advocate General's Department, which is charged with responsibility for legal matters arising in the Military Establishment of the United States, just as the Medical Department is charged with the equally technical matters of cure and hygiene. And one section of the Judge Advocate General's Department is called the Bureau of Military Justice.

In military justice you—if among the 4,000,000 men who now compose our Army you count a son, a brother, husband, kinsman, friend, or friend's friend or kinsman—have a more immediate and vital personal interest than you probably realize. For on the administration of American military justice depend at this very moment and at every moment while he is in the service the good name, the future prospects, the liberty, and possibly the life of the individual soldier you gave to your country.

In those offices in the Mills Building are preserved the records of 15,719 grave crises which recently arose in the lives of an equal number of American soldiers. They are the harvest of the one calendar year of 1918. And every last one of those almost 16,000 potential and mostly actual personal disasters arose through the working out of the theories and practices of American military justice.

Through the authority granted me by the Secretary of War I last week inspected a representative portion of those records.

Those 15,719 documents were records of 15,719 cases tried by general court-martial in the United States Army, one year's increment in the process of what is trustingly referred to as the administration of military justice. The Judge Advocate General is the technical law officer of our Military Establishment. Therefore, presumably, the public assumes that this must be matter of law, and so matter of justice.

Matter of law it is in one way. It is something legalized by action of Congress. But though the right and duty of captains and sergeants to give certain authorized commands under certain authorized circumstances have also been legalized by Congress, and they therefore might also be called matters of law in that meaningless sense, no one ever confuses them with matters of justice. They are described and recognized always as matters of military authority and command. And so should be described and recognized the matters which come up to the Judge Advocate General's office in the form of records of courts-martial.

COURTS-MARTIAL SENTENCES AT PRESENT MERELY MILITARY COMMANDS.

In the course of a speech in the United States Senate recently Senator CHAMBERLAIN said:

The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice. We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer.

If that statement, made on the floor of the senior legislative body of the Nation by the chairman of the United States Senate's Committee on Military Affairs, is true, it raises an issue of grave importance. If it is supported by facts, it raises this question: Shall courts-martial in the United States Army sit as mere instrumentalities of military command or shall they sit as courts of justice administering the law of the land?

And the Senator's statement is fully and amply supported by facts, which my investigation of the records showed. It will be shown you here that while the administration of military justice has been at times progressive and at other times reactionary, like most other phases of human government, it is at this time in this country almost wholly reactionary. It will be shown that though the Bureau of Military Justice in the Judge Advocate General's Department is nominally at the head of the administration of military justice, it is only nominally at the head. It is without legal authority. It does no more than "recommend to a military superior," usually the Chief of Staff, who then exercises his military power of supervision and direction over these recommendations. Under the General Staff act, as construed in present practice, the Chief of Staff exercises the same command over the Judge Advocate General's Department as over the Supply Department. Thereby he has the power to differ, and he does differ, with the head of the Bureau of Military Justice upon matters of pure law, and substitutes instead his own judgment, even though that substitution should extend, as in that mutiny case in Texas, to the point of ordering that, for the purposes of command, wrong shall be right, truth shall be falsehood, innocence shall be guilt, and obedience shall be insubordination.

THE POWER OF MILITARY COMMAND.

It will be shown you that in the United States Army at present judicial power is only a concomitant and incident of military power. It is military power alone which determines whether an enlisted man shall be subjected to court-martial. By virtue of the power of command the military commander determines the sufficiency of the charge and of the evidence upon which a man shall be tried and other similar legal questions. By power of command he details the court-martial and passes on all questions of law arising in the proceedings and all questions of the legality of the proceedings. By power of command he determines the legality of the sentence and orders it executed. All this without independent legal direction or supervision, except that to be found in the "recommendations" of the Judge Advocate General, who is himself subject to superior military authority.

Further still it will be shown you how, from examination of those records which the Secretary of War formally gave me authority to examine, that, even inside the Judge Advocate General's Department, there is an irreconcilable difference of opinion about the proper answer to that tremendous question raised by Senator CHAMBERLAIN—whether in our Army we shall have military law and a system of administering military justice worthy of the names of law and justice or whether we shall have simply a method of giving effect by courts-martial to the more or less arbitrary discretion of commanding officers. It was clearly evident, from official "recommendations" attached to various cases, that in the Judge Advocate General's Department there is a school which believes in the theory that courts-martial are mere instrumentalities of military command, that this is the view of the Judge Advocate General himself, Gen. Crowder, but is not the view held by the officer who, throughout the war, has been Acting Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, nor by most of the officers of the department.

At the beginning of the war the Judge Advocate General's Department consisted of less than a score of officers. It now consists of about 400 officers who have come to it as distinguished lawyers from civil life. These lawyers, I discovered from official indorsements and memoranda attached to records of cases, have found the system not merely antiquated but one admitting on frequent occasions gross injustice and military oppression. Courts-martial try soldiers for all offenses from murder down. They are composed of Army officers ignorant of the rudiments of law. Yet under the present practice of the War Department their judgments, when approved by their camp commander, are final. And the present Judge Advocate General not only believes that the law makes such judgments final but that the law is wise. In one case, in which his views were strenuously opposed by the officers of his own department, he said that military justice was a kind of justice that had to be administered in the camp by the camp commander without legal supervision. This attitude resulted in the denial of the existence of any power in the War Department to correct error committed during these crude trials, though the error might be as prejudicial and unjust to the accused as that committed during the Texas "mutiny" trial. At the outbreak of the war the assistants in the Judge Advocate General's office, appreciating the need of a remedy for such gross wrong, endeavored to revive the revisory power over courts-martial proceedings believed by them clearly to be found in statutes of the Civil War period. The Judge Advocate General himself, though conceding the frequent gross injustice, denied the existence of such a power.

Notwithstanding that attitude, those who have guided the office of the Judge Advocate General since that time and throughout the war have assumed that remedial power must reside somewhere and in some cases of the grossest injustice have succeeded in inducing the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War to take remedial action.

The task of persuasion was probably made possible for them by a single timely though tragic incident. Shortly after the Judge Advocate General's Department had strenuously denied to itself the power of review, 13 negro soldiers in Texas were tried, convicted, and were hanged the day after their conviction was reported to the convening authority and approved and confirmed by him. The record of the proceeding in those cases was not forwarded to the Judge Advocate General's Department for the "revision" required by the statute—whatever that term may mean when the power of effective review is self-denied by him—until three months after those 13 negroes had paid the forfeit of their lives. It is important to note here the fact that the camp commander, who thus by the power of military command made himself accuser, jury, judge, and executioner of those 13 men, was the same commander destined later, in the case of the "mutinous" noncoms, to order that inside his jurisdiction right should be wrong.

THE THEORY OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

But, first, a little clearing of the ground is necessary. Just what is military justice? What is a general court-martial?

Military justice, of course, is the process of putting military law into effective action. And military law is the legal system which regulates the government of the Military Establishment. Military law in the United States derives its existence from special constitutional grants of power and is both written and unwritten. Its written sources are the Articles of War, other statutory enactments of Congress relating to the military service, the Army Regulations, and general and special orders and decisions promulgated by the War Department and by department, post, and other commanders.

Its criminal code of procedure is embodied in the Articles of War, which, as enacted by Congress on August 29, 1916, in their present form, consist of 121 articles which, among other matters, define the limits of military jurisdiction, provide the military tribunals through which that jurisdiction shall be exercised, define the offenses for which persons subject to military law shall be brought to trial before these tribunals, and the punishments they shall suffer if found guilty.

Chief of the criminal tribunals of our American military legal system is the general court-martial, which is given power to try a soldier on practically every charge that can be brought against a human being and power to sentence him, if found guilty, to extremely severe punishment. Death, or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct, is the penalty prescribed by 13 of the so-called punitive articles, and such punishment as a court-martial may direct under 29 others. "Such punishment as a court-martial may direct," in the case of a soldier and in a "time of war," like the present, may be dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances due or to become due during an indicated period of time, and imprisonment at hard labor for any period up to life.

WHAT A GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL IS.

A general court-martial is a body of officers numbering from 5 to 13, the direct appointees of a properly authorized military commander, generally the commanding officer of certain specified military units or areas. It meets, by order of this commander, to try any person whom he orders tried on any charge or charges he may order preferred against that person. The prosecution of the accused is conducted by an officer ordered by the same commanding officer to perform that duty and called a judge advocate, while the accused is given the right to be represented by council of his own selection "if such counsel be reasonably available." Since "civilian counsel will not be provided at the expense of the Government," counsel for the accused is always in practice a line officer not a lawyer and generally junior in grade and immature in human experience, who is ordered by the commander who appoints the court to perform the duty of counsel for the defense. He is, if his services be "reasonably available," an officer requested by the accused, and as to his availability the commanding officer has the final decision.

Before a court so constituted, and by a prosecutor and defender so equipped and so appointed, the accused is tried, all questions of law, including pleas, motions, and objections, arising during the proceedings being determined by majority secret vote of the members. After the evidence has been introduced and the statement of the accused and the arguments of prosecuting judge advocate and defending "counsel" have been heard, the court, again by majority secret vote, determines its finding on the law and facts. If the finding is "guilty," it then, by a majority secret vote, determines the sentence to be imposed, and from this judgment, when duly approved or confirmed, no appeal can be taken, nor can the judgment be set aside or reviewed by the courts of the United States nor of any State.

Such final approval or confirmation, except in capital and a few other specified cases, is the act of the commanding officer who appointed the court, and who, as reviewing authority, has the express power to confirm or disapprove the findings or any part thereof, the express power to confirm or disapprove any part of the sentence, and the power to send the case back to the court for "reconsideration." The final action of the reviewing authority is ordinarily published by promulgation of a "general court-martial order," and after this order has been promulgated the action of the reviewing authority is beyond recall.

SOLDIERS STAND OUTSIDE THE CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTIES.

All your life you have been safeguarded in certain respects by certain fundamental provisions so complete and so effective that the chances are you never completely realized their existence unless you happen to be a lawyer. You have been so safe you have taken your safety for granted, as you take the daily procession of light and darkness. Under amendments 5 and 6 of the Constitution you, as a citizen of the United States, can not "be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." You can not "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." If you become the subject of any criminal prosecution you "enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury and to have the assistance of counsel," which last provision has been interpreted over and over again to mean the substantial assistance of qualified counsel.

Those are the inviolable safeguards of the life and liberties of every citizen of this country, "except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger." Then everything is changed.

Then any citizen of this country, if he has made himself, or has been made, subject to military law, may be arraigned for a crime, which is always potentially infamous and frequently is capital, by order of a single individual. And, having been so arraigned, he will be tried, both on fact and law, not by an impartial jury, but by a body of military superiors, and with no substantial assistance of counsel in his defense.

Consider what has happened in the case of a soldier found guilty and sentenced under a general court-martial order. He has been accused and ordered to trial by a man who was not a lawyer. He has been arraigned and tried before a body of laymen. All legal questions arising during his trial have been settled by a secret vote of those laymen. All evidence for and against him has been admitted or rejected by the same process. The question of fact—the question of his guilt or innocence on the strength of the evidence admitted—has been decided by another secret vote of that body of laymen, without competent judicial guidance. And the laymen, in case their finding was guilty, have determined by secret vote what punishment he shall suffer. The record of their action has been sent to the layman by whom they were appointed, and that layman, at his own discretion, has approved or disapproved their findings and sentence, perhaps a revised finding and sentence, given after "reconsideration," at his order. And that layman's decision is absolutely final. From it there is no appeal to any person or body.

And now, how do our commanding officers exercise that enormous power? How does the system work out in the day-to-day practice which brings the records of 15,719 general courts-martial cases to the Mills Building as the grist of one year's grinding of the mills of "military justice"?

THE FOUR DEATH CASES FROM FRANCE.

We have already seen how it worked out in the case of those 12 noncoms in Texas whose commanding officer ordered prima facie innocence to be guilt for the occasion and hanged 13 negroes three months before the legal record of their trial reached the responsible law officer of the Army, who, though he had no power to review the proceedings in the sense of ordering them revised or set aside, was expressly charged with the duty of examining their legality and by a "recommendation" calling the attention of his military superiors to any points inconsonant with law or justice.

Let us go further. Here are other illuminating cases. All are taken from the official records in the Judge Advocate General's Department:

During last winter, in France, four men—four boys, of whom the eldest had barely reached 20—were court-martialed and sentenced to be "shot to death with musketry"; two for sleeping on post in a front-line trench and two for disobeying an order to drill. Notwithstanding the seriousness of the charges preferred—both carrying the death penalty—the military authorities convened an inexperienced court of minimum membership, the majority lieutenants recently commissioned. A second lieutenant without any knowledge of law was assigned to the "defense." The two soldiers charged with disobedience this "learned counsel" permitted to plead guilty to a capital offense, though at the same time the accused made a statement, inconsistent with this plea, to the effect that because of long exposure for many days before to the intense cold of the mountainous section of France it was physically impossible for them to drill. Upon their plea alone these two were sentenced to death.

The two charged with sleeping on post were tried by the same court and "defended" by the same "counsel." They pleaded not guilty, and made a formal but ineffective defense. It was shown in evidence, however, and not denied by the Government, that the accused had been in the front-line trench for six nights from 5 o'clock in the evening until 7 in the morning, with an actual stand in sentry post of two hours on and one off. No sleeping could be had in such a brief respite, and night after night of such vigilance must bring exhaustion, unless there is a chance for sleep during the short day period. It was testified, and not denied, that it was impossible to sleep in the dugout during the day, because it was used as a place for chopping wood. Furthermore, in one case, the evidence of exhaustion was very convincing, in that the accused had been found asleep once earlier in the evening, about 8 o'clock, and instead of being relieved by the corporal of the guard had been kept on duty, with the result that he was found dozing, as he stood against the trench parapet with his rifle to his shoulder, at about 4 in the morning.

These matters of extenuation the court made no effort to prove or disprove, and should therefore have taken as true. The men were sentenced to be shot to death.

Before the four could be shot the cases had to come to Washington for action by the President, who in this case was the confirming authority, and the Chief of Staff, and, by formality and courtesy, before the Judge Advocate General for his examination and forceless "recommendation." They did so come, and the Judge Advocate General and the Chief of Staff both recommended that the President should uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing and execute the men, the Judge Advocate General stating that it would be unfortunate if the War Department could not agree upon the penalty in those cases.

With the record of those cases I found filed a memorandum written by a high officer of the department, who strongly dissented with the Judge Advocate General in this view. As this dissenter is both an officer of the highest personal repute in the Army and a lawyer whose learning and ability are fully recognized at the bar, it is worth while to note the main points of his position. He said that the same court could not fairly try these four men; that the accused had not had their right of substantial assistance of counsel; that they were young (all under 20, and all volunteers); that their military experience had been brief; and that not one of them had made the slightest fight for his life. Such a defense as each had made, he declared, was not worthy of the name and the trial in the cases was a travesty. He pointed out, too, that Gen. Pershing showed extreme insistence that the death sentences be executed for the sake of example to the Army. Upon this point the dissenter wrote:

"There is an insistence upon the part of Gen. Pershing which tends to prejudice these cases. He seems to have forgot that he is not the reviewing authority. The relation between the appointing authority and the President in these cases is judicial. I do not say that Gen. Pershing may not make recommendations as to the maintenance of discipline in his command; I know he may; but his recommendation in these four cases is a special thing, specially interposed in the course of justice in a special case, and characterized by great insistence. He asks that he be advised by cable of the act of confirmation and makes a powerful argument that they should die, the gist of which is after all to be found in his view of the necessity of exemplary punishment in these cases. It may be that punishment, made especially drastic for the purpose of example, at times has its place and value, but exemplary punishment is dangerous to justice. The execution of all military offenders would very likely decrease the number of future offenses and offenders, but such Draconian methods would destroy justice, without which all else in human society is of no worth.

"It is only right for me to say to you," concluded the dissenter, "that the military mind will, in my opinion, almost unanimously approve of confirmation in these cases. I do not say that the military feature is to be ignored by the Commander in Chief of the Army. I myself would not ignore it. But when it offends my well-considered sense of law and justice I could not follow it."

The "military mind" did approve of confirmation, but the Secretary of War finally came to the partial relief of these soldiers. Two were pardoned. The punishment of the other two, those who had refused to drill, was commuted to three years' penal servitude. In his formal communication to the President as Commander in Chief, recommending this exercise of clemency, Secretary Baker raised two points worth noting. Discussing the death penalty as a military punishment, he said:

"It is fair to assume it arose in time and under circumstances quite different from these, when men were impressed into armies to fight for causes in which they had little interest or knowledge, and when their conduct was controlled without their consent by those who assumed to have more or less arbitrary power over them."

And in commenting on the degree of guilt of the two men who refused to drill he points out a circumstance to which no reference appears in any part of the record of their actual trial—that their company commander was an individual whose notorious and violent pro-German sympathies and open objection to fighting against Germany in the Army of the United States, though he bore its commission and lived on its money, later led to his court-martial, dismissal from the service, and sentence to 25 years penal servitude. "Should not," the Secretary asks, "this circumstance have been taken into account by the court in weighing the heinousness of the disobedience of these two boys, and could as high a degree of discipline be justly expected of them as of men whose superiors set them a proper example?"

TWO CASES OF "DESERTION."

These, of course, are extreme cases, having to do with military offenses committed in the face of the enemy. Let us take some nearer home.

There was a soldier in a camp in Alabama, with a wife and aged parents. He had an excellent record. In December, 1917, he went home on a three days' pass and found his father desperately ill. He remained home until some time in May. The evidence, unimpeached, showed that his people were very poor and in extreme need of his help; that he expected his father's death at any time; that he wore his uniform and made no effort to conceal himself, and at all times intended to return to his command. In May the father died. Two days thereafter the soldier reported to camp to resume his duties. He was tried for desertion, found guilty, and sentenced to 15 years.

This case is one of a class numbering hundreds which all show courts-martial convicting of desertion when the essence of the military crime—the specific intent to desert, the definite intention never to return to duty—is negatived by the evidence. There are many cases where the evidence shows plainly that boys went home only for a last visit before embarking for foreign service, or for the holidays, or to meet some urgent domestic situation. Such are clearly cases of absence without leave—not the desertion which is, in time of war, a capital offense.

"Too many trivial cases are sent to trial," said Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in the Senate, "too many unduly severe sentences are imposed, and the punishments awarded for similar offenses vary too widely."

That the reader may have an opportunity to judge of that for himself, here is another of these cases of "desertion"; this one from Camp Upton, N. Y. It will show, if nothing else, how completely the fate of an accused and convicted soldier is in the hands of the officer who ordered his court-martial. This soldier was tried for desertion last fall, it being specified that he had left his organization without leave on July 19 and been absent therefrom until September 19, when he was apprehended by the civil police and turned over to the military authorities. At his trial the following matters were put forward in his defense, and no attempt was made to disprove them. About three days before his "desertion" he received word that his youngest sister, whose particular friend, supporter, and counselor he had been, was dying in Bellevue Hospital. He asked for a pass to New York, explaining his reason. After waiting three days in vain he left camp without a pass and reached the city to find that his sister had died three hours before his arrival. It was found that she had let her small insurance policy lapse and the immediate problem of giving her decent burial arose.

The accused and his brothers and sisters possessed among them one liberty bond, which an undertaker finally agreed to accept in payment for his services. After that harassing experience the accused was immediately faced with another. The woman with whom he had lived for several years and who was the mother of his two children was his common-law wife. She had had trouble in obtaining the allotments made her from his pay, with the result that she was in dire need and the feeding and clothing of the children had necessarily been neglected. To top all, her mother, always hostile to the couple because of their irregular marital relation, had threatened to report the condition of the children and have them taken by the Gerry Society. And the young couple knew that, since they were not legally husband and wife, they stood very slight chance of getting their children back if once they were taken away.

Under these circumstances, the young man sought and obtained work at his trade of coal handling and worked at it all summer. The evidence showed that he made no effort to disguise his status, wearing his uniform frequently, though never when it would be exposed to the dust and grime of a coal yard, and that when it was left in his dwelling no attempt was made to conceal it. The evidence also showed that he and the woman made constant effort to find a position wherein she might support herself and the children, and that as soon as such a position had been secured he instantly made preparations to return to his duty at the camp. When he was apprehended his uniform had actually been cleaned and pressed by a tailor in order that he might make a soldierly appearance when he reported back.

In Alabama, you remember, such an offender, with very similar mitigating circumstances, was found guilty of desertion and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for 15 years. It seems reassuring and heartening, for the moment, to learn that in New York the charge against the soldier was reduced by the court to absence without leave and the penalty to confinement for six months, later reduced by the reviewing authority to one month. But is it so very heartening, after all? It is good to be thus assured that we have just and merciful men among the officers in our Army. But should that blind us to the fact that there is no power compelling them to be just and merciful, and that even mitigating and extenuating circumstances must mitigate and extenuate, if at all, only by their arbitrary decision, just as it proved, in the case of those "mutineers" in Texas, that innocence itself must change to guilt when a commanding officer gave a military order to that effect? Is that justice? Is it law?

COMMANDERS ISSUE ORDER FOR "JUDICIAL" SEVERITY.

Touching on this matter of "desertions," the file of orders which I found in the Judge Advocate General's Department in Washington shows that at some camps in the United States the military commander has ordered that absence without leave for 24 hours shall be submitted to a special court-martial, which has a punishing power of six months' confinement and forfeiture of six months' pay, and that cases of more than five days' absence shall be submitted to a general court-martial, with unlimited power to punish, and that in such cases the camp commanders have instructed the courts to punish such cases with severity.

The files also show that frequently when courts acquit the convening authority—i. e., the commanding officer—sends the cases back for "reconsideration," with an argument which, coming from the very source of command, virtually compels a conviction; and that there are many cases tried where every legal or other consideration only goes to show that the trial was a result of a gross abuse of military power. With citation of one more human document this phase of the discussion may be brought to a close. This also is a case from Camp Upton, tried last fall. The charge was absence without leave; the specification, such an absence lasting from July 1 to September 11, when the accused reported back for duty. The plea was not guilty; the finding of the court was guilty. The sentence imposed was dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances due or to become due, and five years' imprisonment at hard labor. The action of the reviewing authority was a reduction of the imprisonment to three years and suspension of the dishonorable discharge until that term had been served.

The evidence introduced in behalf of the accused, and not only unimpeached but strongly corroborated, was that the young man, who had been a year in the service and proved a cheerful and dutiful soldier with a strong desire to get overseas, had been in civil life the main support of an ailing mother, a sister, and three younger brothers, the father being a drunkard, who did not live at home but was in the habit of returning there whenever he indulged in one of his periodical sprees and setting out to wreck the place, the only member of the family able to exercise any control over him at such times being this elder brother, William.

Between the incubus of this condition in the home he had left behind him and the repeated disappointments, after a year in camp, of being several times ordered to an overseas detachment and then having the embarkation order rescinded, the accused, as he told the court, "got kind of discouraged all round," and on July 1, having failed to secure a pass, went home without one, to find his father on a spree and his mother in bed with weakness and nervous dread. And in that home, standing between that mother and that father, the young man spent the summer.

He wore his uniform and did not make any attempt to disguise or conceal his status. Nay, more, he took up with an official and semimilitary organization, the home branch of the American Red Cross, the question of finding some adequate means of controlling his father and protecting his mother, short of arrest, the social disgrace of which he was not willing to have his family undergo. This part of his statement was corroborated by the following telegram of the Red Cross to the court which was trying him:

William ———, (address), overstayed last furlough on account father on periodical spree. William alone able to control father at such times. Concealed fact prolonged furlough from mother, who is anxious and sickly.

What criminal lawyer would ask to face a judge and jury with a more moving plea for a client? And what upright district attorney, sworn officer of the court to see that substantial justice is done between the State and the erring individual, would not be strongly moved to enter a nolle pros?

What happened during the administration of "military justice"? Amateur "counsel" for the defense summed up these circumstances colorlessly and briefly, humbly admitted that the man he was "defending" had committed a most grave offense, and politely, almost timidly, asked the court to take the matter of the drunken father into consideration, and, if it could, not to be too hard on the drunken father's son.

Judge Advocate for the United States indulged in a burst of oratory. What he said illustrates so well what it is not unfair to term the animus of the military mind, that it is repeated here verbatim:

As I understand counsel, the accused's difficulty in getting a week-end pass led him to be absent for two and a half months. It must have been a great difficulty that he expected to meet when he met his company commander if he had in mind asking for a pass for the entire months of July and August and the first 10 days of September. I can not believe that a man whose one desire is to get overseas to fight for his country is going to be heartbroken at his failure to get over there at the first possible moment. The fact that a man stays absent for two and a half months indicates that he is a deserter. He is charged with absence without leave, but it is the most serious absence without leave that you could possibly have, without any justification except that there was a drunken father in the family. I think the man should be punished and punished severely.

Five years for William, the civilian in uniform who "got sort of discouraged all round," and then the machinery of our administration of military "justice" took into its maw the next case of those 15,719.

DISCIPLINE IN OTHER ARMIES.

Case after case of similar mold might be added here if space were available. It should be stated definitely as a part of this record that from the historic point of view that the so-called military justice of these United States of ours, besides being blundering and senseless, is archaic—the sole survivor in any decent nation of a system of military discipline which originated in mediæval times and was brought to its full flower by that ardent democrat—Gustavus Adolphus. This system has been abandoned by France, by England, by Italy, by little Belgium; and the spirit and discipline which said, "They shall not pass" at Verdun, which turned the surviving tenth of the "contemptibles," after that fortnight of slaughter and retreat, into the offensive force which smashed the German right for Joffre, which swept the routed Italian armies back to victory, which kept the black and red and yellow of Belgium flying for years never to be forgotten over one small, miserable stretch of marsh and sand dune, were founded on quite a different concept—one which recognized the laws of the land and the rights of men and the fundamentals of justice as being always superior to any mere power of military command however exalted and however necessitous.

It was all this and more that Senator CHAMBERLAIN had in mind when, on the floor of the Senate of the United States, he said:

"The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the names of law and justice. We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

DR. WILLIAM FREDERICK BADE.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have a telegram from Dr. William Frederick Bade, a prominent and well-known citizen of California, who recently was accused of pacifism or of some disloyal or seditious activity by somebody before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee without any proof concerning the matter at all. The publicity given to this unproven charge is a shame and an outrage. In justice to him I ask that the telegram from Dr. Bade be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BERKELEY, CAL., January 27.

Senator HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Never having been a pacifist, but am an active and outspoken promoter of war enterprises, besides having offered my services to the Government in several capacities, I earnestly protest against the unjust charge of pacifism as laid against me on the Senate records, a loyal citizen defenseless against such traducing.

WILLIAM FREDERICK BADE.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD without reading a portion of the address by Hon. Albert J. Beveridge, formerly a Senator from the State of Indiana, before the Massachusetts Bar Association on the 6th of December, 1918. It is that portion of the address relating to the league of nations.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the address of former Senator Albert J. Beveridge before the Massachusetts Bar Association, Dec. 6, 1918.]

"Some excellent and able men now urge that just as the States of the Union have been interlaced into a nation, with concord throughout its dominions, so the nations of the earth shall be similarly united to end strife among all mankind. Why, it is asked, if the States could unite into a nation, surrendering most of their sovereignty to the National Government, should not the various governments of the world form a superstate to which each of these federated nations would yield a part of its sovereignty and obey the decrees of an international authority supreme over all of them?

"This plan, passionately insisted upon under two or three titles, raises the greatest question which the American people have ever been called upon to answer. I have been asked to examine it to-night, but since this can not be done in the brief time remaining I shall merely suggest some of the questions involved.

"If the analogy of the States agreeing among themselves to form a harmonious nation is to be strictly followed, certain results would be inevitable; for example, just as the States, in order to form a nation, gave up the right to pass tariff laws or immigration laws, so the nations comprising the international superstate would have to do the same thing. Indeed, certain foreign champions of this international arrangement urge this very fact as one of the principal reasons why a league of nations should be established.

"If this is not so the analogy fails. The argument based upon a comparison of the union of the States into a nation, with the proposed union of the nations into a world government, would require us to imagine that the States agreed only that they would not fight one another, but kept the right to make tariffs against one another, to regulate or prohibit immigration from one to another, to do the same thing with reference to commerce, and, in short, to act in every way as though each State was a sovereign nation. In short, the States would have agreed not to make war among themselves and yet left open every subject that might cause hostilities. Is it not plain then that this analogy is false, and even absurd?

"The league can be established only by treaty. This treaty binds each member nation to make war anywhere and at any time the league decrees. If America become a member we must, of course, repeal that provision of our Constitution which gives to Congress the exclusive power to declare war. This is admitted. I hear that such an amendment was actually introduced in the Senate. Do we want to abolish that vital provision of our fundamental law? Do we want to bind ourselves and our children forever to make war whether we or they want to or not? Even if we did not formally repeal that section of our fundamental law, would not the result be the same as if we did repeal it, since our honor would be pledged in the treaty to make war, and Congress would be morally compelled to declare it as a matter of good faith to our allies, whenever and wherever a majority of them require it?

"Of course, if the league treaty is not to bind each member to enforce the judgment of the league, then the treaty would amount merely to an agreement that the contracting nations undertake to be good.

"The only reason given for the proposed international superstate is that it may prevent wars by the amicable settlement of disputes. But, on the contrary, does not the plan contain the very seeds of strife? Assume the league in existence, with big and little nations members of it. Suppose two of the larger nations differ radically on some subject which each honestly thinks vital to its well-being. The matter must be settled by a vote of the nations that are members of the league.

"If human nature has not been repealed, would not each of the contending Governments try to get as many votes as possible? Would not this result in, would it not compel, such international intrigue and corruption as the world has never seen? And if one of the disputants should prevail by a single vote or fraction of a vote, would the defeated nation and its associates submit? Or would there be a world-wide cry of fraud followed by resistance? Even if war did not result, would not the league dissolve, leaving behind it bitterness and suspicion more intense and long-lived than even some wars have produced?

"As to the actual structure of the superstate, on what basis would it be erected? Would little nations have the same suffrage as big nations? Would Costa Rica have the same voting power as France? Serbia the same as Great Britain? Uruguay the same as the United States? Tibet the same as Japan? If not, what becomes of the principle that the rights and interests of little nations are as sacred as those of big nations? Since the protection of small nations is one of the main purposes of the proposed league, who are so well qualified to pass on their own safety and well-being as the little nations themselves?

"But in case the lesser nations are to have only fractional votes, who shall decide what those fractions shall be? And would the small nations come into the league on fractional representation? But if the little nations refuse to enter the league as inferiors what is to become of their rights, interests, and honor, which it is one of the principal purposes of the league to protect? Or is the league to tell the little nations what is best for them and, by force, make them submit to the league's opinion?

"If this trifling problem should be solved to the full satisfaction and happiness of all nations, another small question arises: What proportion of the international army and navy which is to execute the decrees of the league shall each nation furnish? Shall this be determined upon the basis of population? If so, China would supply more men and ships than all of Europe, the United States, and Japan combined. Shall contributions to the international police force be determined by comparative wealth? If so, the American Nation must furnish the largest contingent. Or shall the rule of allotment be the degree of comparative intelligence? Or shall it be measured by that clearly defined and accurately established standard called 'civilization'? In either case, who is to decide the relative intelligence and civilization of the nations? Would any nation agree that its people are less intelligent and civilized than others? Also, how shall the command of this international army and navy be settled?

"But assume all these questions to be disposed of, as doubtless they readily can be, and the league to be in full and effective operation. What would be the province of the superstate and what our duty in the matter of revolutions in any country? Governments are constantly changing by revolutions, and revolution in one country sometimes causes war between other countries. For instance, the French Revolution caused the war between Great Britain and France; that in turn resulted in the Napoleonic wars. But it is the league's business to prevent wars. Must the league therefore interfere with revolutions? If so, on which side?

"The late Czar was the first authority in modern times to call an international council for the suppression of war. Suppose that gathering had resolved upon a league of nations, of which the United States, Great Britain, France, and other nations, including Russia itself, were members. It would have been the Government of the Czar that signed that treaty. When that Government was threatened with destruction by revolution, would it not have called and have had the right to call on its international partners to help preserve it?

"Suppose a league of nations had existed at the time of our Civil War. If it intervened in that struggle, does anybody doubt what the result would have been? Do we not know that we would to-day be two nations instead of one?

"But let us say that the supposed world superstate agrees to have nothing to do with revolutions, although by so agreeing the very governments forming the superstate may themselves be destroyed. Let us say that the league proposes to intervene not when different parts of a nation are about to fight one another, but only when different nations are about to fight one another. If the combat can not be prevented and hostilities begin, on which side will the league fight?

"If it be said that the superstate will act against the aggressor, how shall it determine which of the belligerents really is the aggressor, since every nation always claims that the other belligerent is the aggressor, and the decision must be made instantly if war is to be prevented. But sometimes it takes many years to settle the real cause of a war. Which nation was the aggressor in the Russo-Japanese War or in the conflict between China and Japan? Each claimed at the time and still claims that the other was the aggressor.

"Moreover, occasionally the real cause of conflict is not admitted by either belligerent, and could not and would not be submitted to any international court or league. For example, the fundamental cause of the Russo-Japanese War probably was the increase of population in Japan and the necessity for more territory where its people could live, on the one hand, and Russia's historic, natural, and perhaps justifiable desire for ice-free ports on the other hand. Yet this profound reason for the Russo-Japanese collision would not have been admitted by either of the two disputing nations and could not have been settled by an international power. Suppose, then, that since the league could not have dealt with the problem war came, notwithstanding the league's existence. On which side would American soldiers and sailors have had to fight?

"Since one of the objects of the superstate is to protect the territorial integrity, rights, and interests of small nations, what would we, as a member of the league, have been compelled to do in the war between Great Britain and the allied Dutch Republics of South Africa? Or what would have been the league's action when Korea was absorbed by Japan? In our own history, would we have been permitted to wage war with Mexico? If not, what would now have been the situation of that enormous territory which now composes the States of California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona? To-day it is peopled by the freest, happiest, richest men and women on the globe.

"Would we have been allowed to fight Spain? If not, what to-day would be the condition of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines? No such progress is recorded in history as has been made by the people of those islands since they came under American control; and all of them are under American control. Porto Rico and the Philippines are American possessions, and American suzerainty over Cuba is the most perfect ever committed to paper.

"Is not the proposed world superstate an agreement to maintain perpetually, by arms if need be, the status of the world as it shall be at the time the league is formed? Do we not, as a member of the league, underwrite for all time to come the international status quo and guarantee to maintain it with American blood and treasure? And is this wise or right either for ourselves or the world?

"It is not impossible that the whole thing will taper down to a proposal of a league consisting of a permanent alliance of the United States and the three other leading nations of the world. Already I have heard such a suggestion. The world is to be 'policed' and 'kept in order' by the 'big four.' How Holland and Spain and Belgium and the Scandinavian countries will welcome that scheme! And South America! We can already hear loud cheers from that quarter. And none of the nations outside the combine is to be permitted to say a word about the matter—they can come in on the terms prescribed by the 'big four' or stay out. But in either case the 'big four' will attend to their affairs for them. Does not such a project as this suggested 'league of nations, limited' appear somewhat fanciful, not to say unjust? Would it not create universal antagonisms, jealousies, hatreds? And what possible advantage would America derive from it? Is it not plain that it has most of the evils of an unlimited league and some that are even worse?

"Whether the scheme takes in all nations or only a few selected governments, are the American people to be allowed to vote on this question which concerns them so profoundly? Are any people to be permitted to vote on it? Apparently not. The arrangement is to be made by gentlemen in Paris, presented to our Senate in the form of a treaty, and put through without any expression by the people of their will in the premises. If it is said that this is the usual method of dealing with treaties, is not the answer that this is not an ordinary treaty? It resembles no other treaty we ever made except in one point: When it is made we must stand by it whether we like it or not.

"That point is worthy of consideration: If we get into the league, we can not get out. No matter how badly it works for us, no matter how much we may come to dislike it, we are bound, in honor, to remain in it. If, in desperation, we broke the treaty and released ourselves, would we not thereby invite war upon us by the other members of the league? Even if they generously refrained from attacking us, could they be expected ever to trust us again?

"But whether we are to be bound to an alliance with many or few nations, what advantages in any direction would America derive from membership in a league of any kind? Or are American rights and interests unworthy of our consideration? If our own well-being is not to be eliminated from our thought, ought we not ask and answer a few obvious questions?

"Take, for instance, our Mexican relations. That country adjoins us. There have been, are, and always will be more American citizens legitimately engaged in business in Mexico and a greater quantity of American capital legitimately invested there than the citizens and capital of all other countries combined. For years we have endured peculiar, shocking, and indefensible—almost indescribable—outrages upon American citizens and property in Mexico, and this is likely to occur again.

"As a member of an international league could we do anything whatever to protect American lives, safeguard American property, or maintain American rights in Mexico without the consent of the other nations who are our fellow members in the league? If it became necessary for us to establish the same relations with Mexico that we have with Cuba, could this be done without the sanction of the international superstate?

"Or take the Monroe doctrine, which concerns the Western Hemisphere and is vital to the development of it. Would not Japan, Great Britain, or Germany have as much to say as ourselves about what that doctrine means and what may and may not be done under it? If we undertake to help settle the disputes among the nations of Europe and Asia, do we not bind ourselves to allow them to have the same voice in the affairs of the Western Hemisphere?

"If we, with other nations, underwrite the status of canals in the Old World, do we not obligate ourselves that other nations shall, equally with us, control the Panama Canal?

"Would any beneficial result come to us from membership in this international league? Would not the inevitable consequence be that we involve ourselves in racial and historic antagonisms and complications from which thus far we have kept ourselves free? Would we not surrender every advantage which our situation on the globe, our history, our one unbroken traditional policy, and our resources afford us? Would we not place ourselves in the position of an integral, physical part of the continents of Europe and Asia?

"It is said that steam and electricity have eliminated the ocean and that nations no longer are separated by water barriers. Is this true? The English Channel is now as effective a bulwark to the United Kingdom as it ever was. That narrow strip of water and a strong fleet have saved England from invasion for nearly a thousand years. From the military point of view it would appear, then, would it not, that, after all, the Atlantic has not been abolished?

"We are told that we must no longer be 'isolated.' How are we 'isolated'? Not commercially. Not financially. Not socially. We have been 'isolated' only in the political sense, only in the sense that we have not bound ourselves by alliances to mix up in the quarrels of others, only in the sense that we have attended to our own business. Is not that kind of 'isolation' the very thing that is best for us and for the world? If so, why abandon it?

"All the points that I have suggested are only a few of those involved in the present-day recrudescence of the ancient scheme for a league of nations. There are many others, but the lateness of the hour precludes a mention of them. But do not the ones enumerated show that the international journey which we are asked to take is through an unexplored and perilous jungle?

"Is it not better for the American people to advance along the highway of America's traditional foreign policy? That policy was formulated after years of thought, experience, and consultation by all the wonderful company of constructive statesmen who laid the foundations of the American Nation. No such group of far-visioned men ever blessed with their wisdom any country at a given time. Call the roll of them: Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Marshall, and the others of that galaxy of immortals.

"The foreign policy announced by Washington was the product of the combined and profoundly considered judgment of all these men. It was the only policy, foreign or domestic, on which all of them were united. On every other they disagreed. For that alone they stood as a single man. Also that policy has been maintained from that day to this by every American statesman and every American political party.

"For more than a hundred and thirty years the American Nation has progressed along the plain, safe course these men marked out. It has kept us from disastrous foreign entanglements and ruinous foreign complications. It has saved us hundreds of thousands of lives and hundreds of billions of dollars. Why leave it now to wander through a pathless wilderness of alien interests, racial hatreds, historic animosities?

"Do not the well-being of a great people and the development of a mighty continent present problems hard enough to tax all the strength of the ablest men in the whole Republic? If the concerns of a few million people occupying a strip of seaboard engrossed all the energy, thought, and time of men like "the fathers" whom I have just named, have any intellects now appeared capable of caring not only for the affairs of 110,000,000 human beings covering an area that stretches from ocean to ocean, but also capable of adjusting all the differences of all the variegated peoples of the entire globe?

"The situation of the American Nation is peculiar and unique. Geographically it sits on the throne of the world. Its resources are greater than those of all Europe combined. Its history is that of the evolution of a distinct, separate, and independent people. Its mission is no less than to create a new race on the earth and to present to mankind the example of happiness and well-being that come only from progressive, self-disciplined liberty.

"This was the faith of our fathers. By that faith ought we not still abide? The American Nation the supreme love of our hearts, the highest object of our effort and our thought, the American Nation free of hand and unmanacled of foot, marching steadily onward to that destiny to which its place on the globe, the genius of its people, and its orderly institutions of freedom entitle it."

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a short time ago complaints were brought to me to the effect that the order by the Fuel Administration of the District of Columbia requiring dealers to store coal for customers at 75 cents a ton was not being enforced, but was being violated by the coal dealers. I introduced and the Senate passed a resolution requiring the fuel administrator to advise the Senate what measures were being taken to enforce that order and also requiring him to state under what authority the order was issued. The fuel administrator, under date of December 16, sent a report to the Senate, which has been on the table. I wish to read one sentence from that report, as follows:

> Upon the issuance of said order the same was given wide publicity through the newspapers of the District of Columbia, and up to the present time there has not been called to the attention of the fuel administrator any violation of the same by any of the retail dealers in said District.

Mr. President, my information that the order was being violated came from a very reliable source. One gentleman stated to me that he had called to the attention of the fuel administrator a refusal of the dealer through whom he had purchased his coal to put it in at the price fixed by the Fuel Administration. I have heard of other cases. This report of the local fuel administrator was peculiar, to say the least; and in view of the action of the Fuel Administration now it is still more peculiar. It may be that complaints have increased since he made his answer. Sure it must be that complaints have come to him and he is taking a queer way to enforce his order.

Mr. President, I have here an advertisement headed "United States Fuel Administration, Division of the District of Columbia," which was printed in the Washington Post, I think, of Saturday, and I notice in the paper of yesterday that this advertisement is still being carried. It says:

> UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
> DIVISION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.
> To the public:
> In an effort to prohibit the excessive charges heretofore demanded by individuals for the storing of coal in the bins of consumers, the Fuel Administration has issued a regulation to the retail coal dealers of the District of Columbia to the effect that the charge for storing coal shall be at a rate not to exceed 75 cents per ton.
> Inasmuch as the dealers are prohibited from charging more than 75 cents per ton and are expected to perform the service at all times without profit to themselves, the general public is hereby requested to cooperate to the extent of refusing to pay individuals more than the above-named amount. Whenever a greater amount is demanded report should be made immediately to the dealer from whom the coal is purchased. In this way it is believed a very annoying situation may be satisfactorily handled. The Fuel Administration has the assurance of all the coal merchants that they will use every reasonable effort to perform this service at the earliest possible moment when requested by the customer.
> By a spirit of cooperation and patience between dealer and consumer in this connection, it seems reasonable to expect that the exorbitant costs heretofore experienced may be successfully eliminated.
> UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
> BUREAU OF DISTRIBUTION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

Mr. President, it is evident from this advertisement that the Fuel Administration is having complaints made to it, and I have no doubt but that complaints had been made prior to the submission of this report to the Senate. Why the statement should be made that none had been made and that things seemed to be going along very well, I do not know. Why spend money for this advertisement? Why does not he prosecute for a violation of his order? Why not cancel permits to carry on business if the order is not complied with? This seems to be a confession that he can not, in fact, enforce the order.

In order to show the real facts of the situation, I ask that the report sent to the Senate may be printed in the RECORD—it is a short report—together with the order and this advertisement printed in the paper to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order is as follows:

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., November 5, 1918.

To all retail coal dealers:

In order to prohibit the excessive charges heretofore demanded by individuals for the storing of coal in customers' bins, it is hereby ordered by the director for the District of Columbia, United States Fuel Administration, that on and after this date no person shall charge a sum greater than 75 cents per ton for the storing of coal.

All retail coal dealers are hereby directed from this day to arrange for and store all coal delivered by them to residences whenever requested by the purchaser at a cost not to exceed 75 cents per ton.

Respectfully,

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
By BENJ. WOODRUFF,
Assistant Director for the District of Columbia.

ADDRESS BY R. L. M'KELLAR.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I have here an address by Mr. R. L. McKellar, of Louisville, Ky., a brother of the Senator from Tennessee, which was delivered at the Foreign Trade Convention held in New Orleans, La., on the 13th and 14th of this month. It is a very interesting and able address, and I ask permission to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COOPERATION AS A NECESSITY IN DEVELOPING FOREIGN TRADE.

[Address of R. L. McKellar, secretary exports control committee, Washington, D. C., at Foreign Trade Convention, New Orleans, La., January 13–14, 1919.]

"One of the most wonderful years in the world's history has come and gone. The greatest war in human history has ended in glorious victory. The most momentous problems that ever faced mankind must be solved in the year on which we are about to enter. To be living in such a time as this is a glorious privilege. To have had a share, however small, in the great things that transpired in 1918 is an honor. To be permitted a part in the work of 1919 is life's opportunity."

These are the words of a Louisville pastor a few weeks ago, and so fitted are they to the spirit of the time that the liberty of repeating them here is taken.

The allies by the courage and endurance of their armies and the unceasing watchfulness of their navies succeeded in holding in check for almost three years the strongest fighting machine the world has ever known. However, the final outcome was problematical until the United States, with the weight of its men, money, and munitions, and the wonderful spirit of its men, turned the scale and menacing militarism was successfully crushed.

The participation of this country in this great struggle was not for conquest, not for expansion, not for aggrandizement, but for the principle of humanity and liberty.

With its successful ending comes the problems of peace and the revival and readjustment of world trade. One of the first commercial problems is what part this country is to take in foreign commerce. Will all the leading nations of the world, now so largely numbered among the allies, enter a mad scramble for this trade and indulge in selfish and wasteful competition, or will it be sought upon the same high principles of right, honor, justice, and fair dealing as have characterized the conduct of the war? Assuming that the same high plane will be adopted, let us determine, if we can, what will be the attitude and policy of the United States in general and the outlook for our southern section in particular.

Prior to the war the domestic business of this country was so ample and remunerative that we were not forced to seek foreign trade other than for surplus production and from our abundance to supply other countries with our raw materials. This condition, however, was changed somewhat during the war period, when foreign trade of leading European nations was practically suspended, with the result that this trade was in part driven to the United States as the only country in position to supply it.

Our attempt to supply this demand has been subject to rigid conservation restrictions, which have served to limit the volume. This restricted experience, however, has been instructive and stimulating, and now that peace is in sight it is found that everywhere in trade circles, and even around the fireside and with the suffragists, foreign trade and its kindred interests are being discussed. Numbers are harkening back to sea, and thought and attention is being turned to the building, manning, and operating of ships and the exchange of commodities with other countries.

The United States Shipping Board is releasing several hundred thousand tons of shipping monthly, and with a merchant marine in early prospect equal to that of any other nation, it becomes necessary for our merchants, manufacturers, and producers to find profitable employment for these vessels and for the output of converted war industries. Furthermore, this country has won the good will of a large part of the world by the unselfish part it has taken in the war, and it is also a fact that the countries of the world have been drawn much closer together and have become better acquainted as the result of the war. Therefore, all things considered, the United States can not longer escape its full responsibility as an exporter of a reasonable share of what it manufactures and produces of the world's needs.

Let us briefly review the relative position of the Gulf ports and in a way take stock of some of the advantages and disadvantages.

The North Atlantic ports, with their immense port facilities, their long-established steamship lines, and their close proximity to the more densely populated manufacturing sections of this country, naturally attract the greatest volume of our export and import commerce.

The Pacific ports also have first call from standpoint of ocean distance to Alaska, the Orient, the Philippines, and Australia. It therefore behooves the Gulf ports to thoroughly analyze their assets and advantages and bring them into complete coordination and cooperation.

It must be realized that the territory tributary to the Gulf does not possess the diversified manufacturing interests to anything like the same extent as the territory adjacent and tributary to the North Atlantic ports, and that the distance from the Gulf to European ports is upwards of 1,000 miles greater than from North Atlantic ports. On the other hand, the territory tributary to the Gulf produces important commodities that Europe must of necessity have, such as cotton, cottonseed products, oil, grain and grain products, naval stores, lumber, and other forest products. These furnish a base for vessel cargo and insures steamship service to move them. The extension of this steamship service largely depends upon the amount of additional diversified cargo that can be attracted.

To the West Indies, Mexico, Central America, and to both the east and west coast of South America, the distance is in favor of the Gulf.

To the Orient, the Philippines, and to Australia the Gulf is also a factor through the Panama Canal.

These ports are served by approximately 50,000 miles of road. Embraced in this extensive mileage are found strong railroad systems, having a vital interest in the growth and development of the ports they serve, and at each and every one of these ports will be found one or more rail carrier that is not only obligated but pecuniarily interested in promoting the best interests of that port. In addition to the 50,000 miles of railway referred to as serving Gulf ports, there can safely be added 20,000 additional railway miles in the nature of connecting lines, north and west, giving in the aggregate 70,000 miles of railway mileage engaged in transporting the products of mines, field, and factory along lines of least resistance to the Gulf. In addition to this total railway mileage, the mileage of navigable streams into the Gulf approximates 19,000 miles, or something over two-thirds of the navigable stream mileage of the entire United States. This substantial water mileage exerts both active and potential competitive force in the way of affording transportation along the lines of least resistance and in the establishment of low rates.

Therefore it can safely be said that the United States will be a strong factor in world trade, and that the Gulf can compete favorably for trade with Europe, Asia, Australia, Philippines, West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, and Africa. These countries embrace the greater portion of the population of the world.

The subject assigned to me is "Cooperation as a necessity in developing foreign trade."

At this time what seems most necessary is to first determine what are the leading factors essential to foreign trade and to reach a full understanding of what is required of all concerned to meet national competition as we shall find it. The principal factors are exporters and importers; inland transportation, both rail and water; port agencies, facilities, steamship service, and foreign banking facilities. Collateral agencies and instrumentalities are colleges and universities for the training of young men for work in foreign trade, port and interior boards of trade, foreign consuls, commission houses, freight brokers, the United States Shipping Board (including its port and harbor-facilities commission), the United States Department of Commerce, the Pan-American Union, the exports-control committee, foreign trade journals, and the daily press.

If a "chain of influence" and a community of interest and of mutual understanding can be established as between these several agencies and instrumentalities, the foundation for a stable and cohesive foreign commerce is well laid.

I am not here to tell these several agencies and instrumentalities how to conduct their business, and upon the assumption that the fundamentals of purchase and sale and the securing of foreign trade, the Webb law, etc., are generally understood the following observations along cooperative lines are offered:

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS.

Exporters and importers should know each other and there should be a measure of cooperation between them in the matter of steamship service, in that steamships require return cargo to insure profitable operation. It is also pointed out that exporters and importers have available to them for the asking much valuable information collected and compiled by the United States Department of Commerce and by the Pan-American Union, also the United States Chamber of Commerce.

RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

It can not be fairly said that in the past the railroads have failed to do their part in the development of the export and import traffic which the United States has heretofore produced and consumed. However, when the purposes of Federal operation incident to war have been served and these carriers are turned back to their owners, relieved of the legislative handicaps that have arrested their progress and left free to exercise initiative and to engage in healthful competition, it may not be amiss to have an obligation to develop foreign trade written into their Federal charters. The cooperation of the trained traffic organizations of these several rail carriers is to be had for the asking.

INLAND WATER TRANSPORTATION.

The strong arm of Government aid and control has recently been extended to inland water transportation with the expectation that it will be revived and become an actual factor in transportation. As approximately two-thirds of the total mileage of navigable streams in the United States empty into the Gulf, the ports of the Gulf will therefore be the greatest beneficiaries of this Federal support.

PORT AGENCIES AND FACILITIES.

A considerable volume of traffic is forwarded locally to the ports and from there reshipped to foreign ports.

In the movement of export commerce there are three distinct units of service—first, the movement from point of origin to tidewater terminal; second, the handling from cars or boats, either direct or through storage warehouses, to the ocean carrier; third, the ocean carriage to the foreign port. "A chain is no stronger than its weakest link." Therefore, as the connecting link between the inland and ocean carriage, it is highly essential that port facilities and port service, both manual and mechanical, be efficient and cooperative. At no place is it more important that there should be a full and complete understanding of foreign trade requirements than at ports. Therefore, in all responsible positions calling for expert knowledge and experience high-class talent should be employed.

OCEAN TRANSPORTATION.

Ocean transportation is now a crying need everywhere. The merchant marine of every country has been largely depleted by submarine losses, and present ocean tonnage is scarcely more than sufficient for the transportation home of the demobilized troops, together with the necessary food supplies for the allies and for the starving populations of Europe.

Commercial exports long suspended are accumulating at the factories and at the ports impatiently awaiting transportation to foreign destinations. A tremendous responsibility rests upon the United States Shipping Board in supplying the present and prospective needs of this commerce, and business as a whole, supported by the Federal administration and a popular demand, is looking with confidence to that organization to fulfill this responsibility to the extent of supplying this country with a merchant marine second in size to none in the world, and organized and equipped to meet the legitimate competition of other exporting nations. Gulf ports will no doubt be assigned a liberal share of the vessels released by the Shipping Board, but in the meantime it will be well for these ports to support and encourage to the limit their existing steamship lines and at the same time reach out and secure additional lines. In this endeavor the humble "tramp," in which the greater part of Great Britain's immense foreign commerce is transported, should not be overlooked or underestimated.

FOREIGN BANKING FACILITIES.

The leading banking interests of this country are to be congratulated upon the aggressive, constructive work that they have been doing in recent years to provide necessary banking facilities in foreign countries for American commerce. It is true that the establishment of foreign branches is so far limited mainly to a few of the larger eastern financial interests, but the necessity for extension is recognized and the system is growing, with result that banks in the interior and at southern ports are rapidly acquiring foreign departments and either have formed or are forming foreign connections that will ultimately result in banking arrangements being available for customary use at whatever port through which a foreign shipment moves.

The establishment of foreign branches by Federal reserve banks is no doubt receiving the special consideration this deserves.

COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES.

A systematic campaign should be inaugurated with all colleges, universities, etc., for the purpose of placing clearly before them the educational needs of this country in foreign trade. There will be a wonderful field for well-educated young men in Consular Service and also in foreign-trade service, and it will be well for colleges and universities to offer special courses in these studies. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce will need any number of consuls and commercial attachés in foreign countries, and manufacturers in this country will need traffic managers who are familiar with foreign trade, and these same manufacturers will also need well-educated young men to represent them in foreign countries.

COMMERCIAL ORGANIZATIONS.

Boards of trade and other commercial organizations at the ports, also in the interior, can be of inestimable value in stimulating interest and disseminating information in connection with foreign trade. All leading organizations now have foreign-trade committees specializing in this work, and many employ foreign-trade experts to study and keep their exporting members advised of rapidly changing conditions in overseas markets, customs, laws, and port regulations brought about by the war. The value and importance of this work will steadily increase with the restoration of normal trade conditions, and organizations not thus equipped may well give early consideration to catching step.

A large number of southern manufacturers and producers have heretofore been somewhat reluctant to engage in foreign trade, and it largely rests with the commercial organizations of the South to overcome this reluctance and thereby weld the first links in a community of export interests. An excellent first aid in this work is a branch or district office of the Department of Commerce.

COMMISSION HOUSES, TRADING COMPANIES, AND FREIGHT BROKERS.

These are essential adjuncts to foreign commerce, and their value should be recognized and supported accordingly and their assistance fully utilized. In normal times a goodly part of the total volume of the foreign trade of the great port of New York is transacted through these agencies.

FOREIGN CONSULS.

Resident representatives of foreign governments are in position to furnish much valuable information as to the needs and methods of the countries they represent, and these representatives will no doubt willingly become a part of a community of export interests.

THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Every port of importance is used more or less by the Army and Navy, and the good will, support, and cooperation of officers of the Army and Navy will prove of great value to any port.

EXPORTS CONTROL COMMITTEE.

This committee is composed of a responsible representative of the War Department, Navy, the shipping control, the allies, and the United States Railroad Administration. It is the duty of this committee to inform itself as to the probable amount of freight which must be exported for the prosecution of the war; how this war freight and commercial exports can be best routed through the various ports; how much other essential export traffic has to be handled; and the amount of local traffic necessary for each port. The committee has authority to select the port to which specified freight shall be transported for shipment overseas and to decide the distribution of the combined amounts of all exports as between the various ports to facilitate its handling and avoid congestions. In the exercise of these functions this committee has divided the United States into eight zones and has issued a zone routing chart, in which due provision has been made for movement through Gulf ports. Since the convoying of merchant vessels has been discontinued the merchant fleet as a whole has been more liquid, with the result that southern ports can be more freely used than during the period of the war, when the shortest ocean voyage was necessary in order to economize in ocean tonnage and convoy service.

The overseas food program for the current year will be something immense and Gulf ports are already being extensively used in the handling of grain, flour, canned goods, etc., and the expeditious handling of this movement at ports can not be too strongly emphasized.

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION.

It will no doubt be of interest to know that the United States Railroad Administration at Washington is planning a comprehensive foreign trade program, including the relationship between inland and ocean transportation, relative adjustments of export and import rates, through rates and routes, service, etc. Gulf ports will no doubt be given full opportunity to submit recommendations, and an early suggestion might be to establish joint steamer and rail passenger rates and service from the west coast of South America, through the Panama Canal and New Orleans, thence via rail through the Southern States to Washington and New York, and thence via Atlantic steamship lines to British and continental ports.

FOREIGN TRADE JOURNALS AND THE DAILY PRESS.

Interesting and instructive publicity and the power of the press are essential to the successful welding of a chain of influence and the formation of a community of expert interests.

In Washington, and in administration circles, the ports of the United States are classified and considered as being in four groups—the North Atlantic, the South Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific. This convention has been called in the interest of all Gulf ports. It is most timely and opportune, and the commercial organizations of New Orleans are to be congratulated upon making this a sectional rather than an individual port gathering. The one-port idea, either on the Atlantic or the Gulf, is un-American.

The camps at home and abroad are demobilizing and the boys are coming home. The War Industries Board and its priorities committee have served their usefulness and have disbanded. The War Trade Board is still functioning, but its restrictions on both exports and imports are being rapidly canceled. The Shipping Board and War Department are releasing vessels commandeered for war purposes and returning them to their owners for replacement in commercial service. Now vessels are being turned out from our shipyards in increasing numbers and shipping of other countries is also finding its way to our ports for lading heretofore inaccessible. In the words of one of our leading manufacturers in a recent circular, "We are now confronted with peace."

We face the threshold of a new era in the world affairs and the call is for a program of constructive foresight. May our great country be as farseeing, high-minded, unselfish, and also as successful in peace commerce as in war, and may the Gulf ports of New Orleans, Gulfport, Mobile, Pensacola, Tampa, Key West, Orange, Beaumont, Port Arthur, Texas City, Houston, Galveston, and Aransas Pass, with cooperation and good faith and fair dealing, enjoy a full measure of the world's commerce.

ALLOTMENT TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall not encumber the RECORD with the number of letters which I have received during the last week from mothers, fathers, and wives whose sons and husbands are in the Army and who for a number of months have had withheld from them the small pittance which the Government pays and which the soldiers set aside for their support; but I shall content myself with expressing my regret at the system used for the payment of these obligations which the Government owes to the dependents of soldiers, a system which is so defective that actual want and suffering has resulted therefrom. I saw a letter this morning from a gallant young officer who has been at the front in France since July and who has won distinction for valor, which stated that not a dollar of his pay set aside for the support of his family has been delivered to them by the Department. It is an outrage. There can not be any excuse for such gross inexcusable carelessness. It is no justification to say there is a scarcity of clerks and an accumulation of work in the departments. If the soldier at the front had done nothing but render an excuse of that kind for failure to be at the proper place to meet the enemy, the American colors would have been dishonored. The soldier has been at his post, he has done his duty to his country, while his Government at home has neglected his family.

I shall not put these letters in the RECORD. I would do so if it would do any good, but I am quite sure it would accomplish no good. But I take this method of expressing the hope that the department will pay more attention to these vital matters in the future and relieve the suffering of the dependent relatives of the soldier. It is enough to ask the soldier to give his life if need be in defense of his country or suffer the hardships of war without imposing upon him anxiety and worry regarding the welfare of his family at home.

LANDS IN OREGON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2784) to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916, which were on page 2, line 13, after "shall," to insert "first"; on page 2, line 16, to strike out "that may be classified as agricultural"; and on page 2, line 17, strike out "reasonable."

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 14746. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 14894. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 14945. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a favorable report (No. 664) from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on Senate resolution 415 and ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Ohio reports from the Committee on Privileges and Elections Senate resolution 415, referring to petition of Henry Ford contesting the election of Truman H. Newberry as a Senator from Michigan to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and authorizing said committee to take possession of the ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and documents, and to make investigation and take all necessary proceedings relating to said contest.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the report go over until to-morrow.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not hear the request.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the report go over until to-morrow under the rule, and that it be printed.

Mr. WATSON. Are resolutions now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us get the report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections straightened out. How does it go over for a day when it has to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. It is the report of a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where does it go now?

Mr. LODGE. All reports of committees shall lie over for one day for consideration unless by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For consideration?

Mr. LODGE. For consideration. The motion to refer to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is a debatable motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable. Under the statute the report must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is debatable on the question of whether or not it shall be referred at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not debatable. These expenditures, if they are to be made, have to be authorized by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. There are no exceptions in the rule about reports of committees, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is that they shall lie over for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. It is a debatable motion. Any motion to refer is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion to refer is needed. It is to be referred under the statute.

Mr. LODGE. I think that it is debatable, because the Senate may decide not to refer it, as they have done on more than one occasion.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is no matter to the Chair, except to get this matter straightened out. The Chair is of opinion——

Mr. LODGE. I did not know a point of order had been made, but if it has been made, of course, I should like to discuss it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I assume that this report would go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate automatically. If a motion is not necessary, I withdraw it, and leave the matter for the disposition of the Chair as to what shall be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no interest in what becomes of it except to know where it goes. When reports are submitted and lie over a day for consideration they go to the calendar; that is where they go ordinarily. The inquiry which was made by the Chair was to ascertain what to do with this report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the rule seems to be pretty clear. It reads:

> All reports of committees * * * shall lie over one day for consideration.

That does not take it to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Chair would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts where such matters go?

Mr. LODGE. Like all other reports and resolutions, they lie on the table, subject to call; they come up automatically. I never heard of a report being debated and put through in the manner suggested if it was asked to have it lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There would be an interesting situation here if everything came up automatically.

Mr. LODGE. If a report lies over one day, and is printed, of course it comes up automatically. That does not carry it to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order to settle the matter, the Chair refers this report to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. From that action of the Chair an appeal may be taken.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have an opportunity to discuss that. I appeal from the decision; and I should like to make the point that the rule is perfectly explicit. It says, "All reports of committees," without exception. It does not except a reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The provision relative to reference to that committee comes under the statute.

I also make the point that it is subject to debate at this stage; that there is no provision of the rules that can cut off debate. I should be glad to know if the Chair is of opinion that the motion to refer to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is a nondebatable motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair thinks it is debatable. The Chair is ruling that, in the view of the Chair, whenever the proposal is to spend money out of the funds of the Senate, before the proposition can be considered by the Senate, it must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It goes there automatically under the statute.

Mr. LODGE. Then I understand the Chair to say that it goes to that committee because the Senate can not consider the proposition until the committee has passed upon it; and yet the Chair has just stated that the question is open to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The appeal from the ruling of the Chair is open to debate.

Mr. LODGE. That is just the point I wanted to get at. Do I understand the Chair to say that the motion to refer to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is not a debatable motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no such motion pending. The Chair referred the report to that committee on his own order.

Mr. LODGE. On the contrary, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] moved, and properly moved, that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may correct the Senator from Massachusetts, it is true I did make the motion in that way; but, in view of the statement which was made that the report went automatically to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I withdrew that motion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Ohio made the motion which is always made in such cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And withdrew it.

Mr. LODGE. And he withdrew it on the suggestion of the Chair. If I may have a moment to examine the rule as to nondebatable motions——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not trying to stop debate. The Chair is trying to settle this question of procedure, and has ruled——

Mr. LODGE. What has the Chair held?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that the report goes automatically to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. From that ruling of the Chair the Senator from Massachusetts has appealed to the decision of the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts can talk on that as long as he pleases.

Mr. LODGE. I also wanted to ascertain—because it is an essential part of it—whether the Chair rules that it is now out of order to debate the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To debate the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nothing is out of order when a Senator has a right to debate. He may talk about anything he pleases.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that the appeal from the decision of the Chair is not debatable. Rule XX covers that. It provides as to appeals from the decision of the Chair:

> And every appeal therefrom shall be decided at once, and without debate.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President. Of course, I am aware of that rule; but there has been debate upon the matter, and I never before knew debate in such a case to be cut off. However, in view of what is intended, I quite understand why debate is desired to be cut off.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. There is no use getting excited about this. The Chair does not sustain the point of order, but rules that the appeal is debatable.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can only reiterate what I have said, that the rule seems perfectly clear. It says:

All reports of committees—

This is a report of a committee—shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

I can not see what excepts this report from the rule. There is no rule about it automatically going to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The statute requires it; but I have seen in this Congress a resolution debated on the question of a matter going to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate before it was sent to that committee. It is entirely within the power of the Senate to dispose of the report without sending it to that committee, and if they have that power it must intervene.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that my recollection of the provision of the statute is that it simply provides that warrants can not be paid until they have been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The statute does not require that a resolution shall be referred to that committee at any particular time, but only that there shall be such reference before the warrants are paid.

Mr. LODGE. I have not the statute here, because I did not come prepared, I am frank to say, for any such ruling as has been made. I never before knew a report of a committee to be ruled to be not subject to the provisions of Rule XXVI, and therefore I am not prepared upon it at all. I should like to have an opportunity to present the statute so that the Senate may at least know on what ground this ruling excepting this kind of a report from all other reports is made. I should like to have long enough time at least to get the statute, because I am not aware that the rule requires anything of the sort.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts desires to send for the statute I should like to ask that the pending matter may be suspended for a few moments.

Mr. LODGE. If I could have a few moments to procure the statute I should be obliged, and I shall not object to the matter being passed over for a moment or two in order that I may procure the statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that may be done, Mr. President, I should like to submit a resolution of somewhat similar character. I inquire if I can do that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent; yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the resolution? I should like to have the regular order preserved as far as possible.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a resolution on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary providing for the continuance of the employment of an additional clerk. I am aware that we have not reached the point of presentation of resolutions. I am trying to save time, and, Mr. President, if there is no objection, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 424), as follows:

Resolved, That the authority given to the Committee on the Judiciary by Senate resolution No. 325, agreed to October 24, 1918, to employ an assistant clerk at a salary not to exceed $5 per diem, for a period not to exceed four months, be, and the same is hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. LODGE. What is that resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution submitted by me naturally goes to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I did not catch the import of the resolution, and I ask that it be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we are not ready to proceed with the other matter, I ask unanimous consent——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Here is the statute that the Senator from Massachusetts desires.

Mr. LODGE. I have it now, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I presume the resolution submitted by me will go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the way the Chair has been referring such resolutions. The Chair is trying to find out whether he is right or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand that my resolution has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer it there if there is no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so referred.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Rule XXV, relative to the appointment of committees, provides:

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of five Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same.

There are similar provisions in regard to the Committee on Enrolled Bills and duties and powers of other committees. The law says:

Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives unless sanctioned by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

That statute merely provides for the necessary steps to legalize the vouchers.

Mr. President, I contend that neither of those provisions exempts this report from the rule covering all reports.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What has the Senator to say about the plain statement that all resolutions of the nature indicated shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Of course they must ultimately go there; there is no question about that; but there is no provision that any report shall be exempted from other rules. The question of whether or not a report shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is a debatable question, because the Senate may decide not to send it there, and in that case it fails.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it is not sent there the law is violated.

Mr. LODGE. It does not violate the law if the Senate decides to send it to a different committee and kills it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a week or so ago the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] submitted a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, I believe, which involved the expenditure of money. I then read to the Senate from the statute and suggested that the resolution ought to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Chair overruled that contention, and the resolution never did go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but it went to the Committee on Foreign Relations for further consideration as to whether or not that committee desired to incur the expenditure. I do not know whether that governs this case. I have been trying to look it up, but have not time to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will pardon the Chair for a moment, this question has been a source of constant irritation to the Chair ever since the present occupant assumed his present position as to what is the right or wrong thing to do about these questions which are constantly arising. In the case of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska the question was whether the resolution submitted by him should go first to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate or to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was finally decided to send it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. All the Chair wants—and he has purposely brought the question up here—is to get a definite ruling of the Senate as to whether or not these resolutions can lie over a day and then be debated, as to whether they may go to some other committee, or whether, under the statute and the rule, they shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate in the first instance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the other day I took the ground that they ought to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but the Chair ruled otherwise, and on an appeal he was sustained by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair remembers that very well. The question occurred at that time on the introduction of the resolution originally. The Chair is only seeking a ruling of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for saying so, the provision in regard to powers of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate does not draw any distinction whatever between the stages of a resolution. It says "all resolutions directing the payment of money." If the ruling of the Chair is correct as to this stage, then any resolution at any stage must go to that committee. When it is introduced it must go to that committee; such a reference must be preliminary to any action on any resolution that involves a charge. That never has been the habit. Resolutions involving a charge are constantly reported to other committees for a prior decision, for the very simple reason that if the resolution is not to pass there is no need of sending it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. This seems to me simply another stage, and I am unable to see anything in any rule that distinguishes the report now presented from all other reports.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I find in the precedents that Vice President Sherman on May 15, 1909, ruled expressly that a resolution carrying an expenditure of money could not be considered by the Senate on its merits, but should go first to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

I find further along that again, on July 28, 1911, he ruled, after the rule had been quoted which recites, referring to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

> To which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same. * * *
> The Senator's amendment proposes a charge upon the contingent fund in excess of the statutory limitation, beyond which the Senate can not go without a reference to the committee, and it involves a matter which has not been considered by the committee. That is the impression of the Chair, and the Chair feels constrained to sustain the points of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that was in the case of a resolution appropriating money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That is a very different thing; that was not the report of a committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was a resolution, however, providing for an appropriation out of the contingent fund.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand, this is a resolution providing for an appropriation from the contingent fund, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it involves that. That is not the whole purpose of the resolution, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Again, on January 9, 1913, the subject was under very frequent discussion; and Senator Bacon in the chair, following a view presented by Senator Works, held that the Senate could not pass upon a resolution carrying an expenditure from the contingent fund until it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Just where that leaves the question still is not perfectly clear. I remember the case that we had a day or two ago, when we asked the opinion of the Committee on Foreign Relations before considering the subject at all. I can not see how the Senate could undertake to pass upon such a resolution without first sending it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it seems to go there automatically without a motion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, this is not a proposition simply to spend money. This is a report of a committee. It comes under the head of a report. This particular resolution is for two purposes—a double purpose. The expenditure is merely incidental. The Senate may decide to take any action with that report. They may recommit the report, which will carry it back to a stage where it is admittedly open—that is, back to the committee. The Chair has just held that where there is a choice in sending it to one of two committees it may go to one of those two committees. This is a report, and I say there is nothing that I can find in any rule or statute that takes it out of the general rule governing reports. The object of that rule governing reports is to give the Senate an opportunity to see what the report is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the resolution is carried with the report.

Mr. LODGE. Ultimately it must go to the committee. No one doubts that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the resolution should be considered by the committee before we act upon the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Not necessarily. We may recommit the report to the committee that has already reported it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because the friends of the movement, whatever it may be, would certainly be at an unfair disadvantage if they were compelled to discuss a resolution on its merits for final action when they could not act favorably upon it without first sending it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my point is that this setting aside the general rule covering reports involves making it a nondebatable motion. That is, it is not debatable. Whenever any committee reports any resolution, if it carries a few dollars for a stenographer, it can not be debated by the Senate. Nothing can be done with it. It can not even go over and be printed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, from the Senator's position, I do not understand that to be a fact. I agree with him that he may move to recommit the resolution to the same committee. That would be debatable. I agree with him that he could move to refer it, now that it is back, to the Judiciary Committee; but if it comes back to the Chair without any motion whatever to refer it to any committee, then the statute comes into force and effect and automatically refers it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator perhaps was not here. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] submitted this report and made the usual and customary motion that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I asked that it lie over under the rule and be printed. The Chair then suggested that it would have to go automatically and at once to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Senator from Ohio withdrew his motion.

Now, it is perfectly easy for me to make half a dozen motions which are in order at this time; but the fact is that I was really so completely surprised that that general rule about reports should be suddenly changed that I did not make any of those motions. I can easily move to recommit it, which is a debatable motion, or I can move to refer it to another committee, which is a debatable motion; and it seems to me, with all those possibilities of motions, that that very fact shows that it is a debatable question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt but that it is debatable. It is being debated. The question that occurs to me, however, is this:

The Chair is not confronted with a great many suggestions which the Senator from Massachusetts has made. The Senator has suggested that he might make a motion to recommit or he might make a dozen other motions. The Chair would probably hold those motions in order, and the debate would then be logical. He has not seen fit to make the motion. It is immaterial whether the Senator from Ohio moved to refer it or not; that motion does not lie on the table now.

Mr. LODGE. No; it was withdrawn.

Mr. PITTMAN. It has been withdrawn. The Chair is confronted simply with this state of facts:

A resolution calling for money lies on the desk. What shall the Chair do with it? The only question submitted to the Chair was, Should he let it go to the calendar or follow the mandate of the statute and let it go to the committee? The Chair followed the mandate of the statute, because there was no other motion before the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. It is still open to me to make a motion to recommit, of course. A motion is in order to recommit or to refer to another committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. The matter now stands on an appeal from that decision of the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know—however, the Chair may rule all those motions out of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator can find out very easily.

Mr. THOMAS. You can not do it unless you make the motion.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the appeal and make the motion to recommit.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Chair undoubtedly, in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, is correct in his ruling on this question, or the appeal would undoubtedly go to a vote, and very probably we could try the other matter.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to go to a vote, or to dispose of it in any way; but that does not deprive me of the right to make the motion to recommit. It seems to me, however, that the ruling necessarily carries with it that no resolution carrying a charge on the contingent fund can be debated, nor is it subject to any debatable motion. It seems to me that is an inevitable conclusion, and that is the reason why I have taken the liberty of discussing it, because it opens such a wide field.

Mr. PITTMAN. What would the Chair do if there were no motion made?

Mr. LODGE. I assume, of course, that the matter would lie over in the usual way and be taken up to-morrow. The report would go over one day and come up to-morrow for debate.

Mr. PITTMAN. But if the statute says that it shall be referred, the Chair can do nothing else.

Mr. LODGE. This is a Senate resolution. It is not a bill or a joint resolution. It is a Senate resolution simply.

Mr. PITTMAN. And to that the statute applies.

Mr. LODGE. It applies to anything. The statute applies to everything carrying a charge on the Treasury, whether it is a joint resolution or a bill or anything else.

Mr. PITTMAN. And in the absence of a motion before the Chair, the Chair has but one thing to follow, and that is the statute.

Mr. LODGE. If the proposition were to make the appropriation now, undoubtedly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MARTIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. POLLOCK (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which I transfer to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I am unable to secure a transfer and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. BECKHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I transferred my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. As the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, as just announced, and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. COLT. In his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE. As my vote has been taken care of by a transfer, I shall not vote.

Mr. REED. I made the transfer, but, in view of the Senator's appearance and his clear right to vote in his own behalf, I will withdraw my vote and permit the Senator from Oklahoma to be recorded.

Mr. GORE. As it will not change the result, I will let the transfer stand.

Mr. REED. Very well, then, let it stand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important public business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained on official business.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 26, as follows:

AYES—36.

Ashurst	Hollis	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Pollock	Thomas
Culberson	King	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	Kirby	Ransdell	Trammell
Gay	McKellar	Reed	Underwood
Hardwick	Martin, Ky.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Henderson	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Walsh
Hitchcock	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

NAYS—26.

Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
France	Knox	Penrose	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson
Gronna	McNary	Sherman	Weeks
Hale	Moses	Smoot
Harding	Nelson	Spencer

NOT VOTING—34.

Baird	Gerry	McCumber	Simmons
Beckham	Goff	McLean	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gore	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Kellogg	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Kendrick	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Kenyon	Phelan	Wadsworth
Cummins	La Follette	Robinson	Wolcott
Dillingham	Lenroot	Saulsbury
Fall	Lewis	Shields

So the Senate decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the Senate.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have a communication from the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who asks to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move that that request be granted and that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] be assigned to the committee to fill the vacancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. HOLLIS, be relieved from further service as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia and that the Senator from Texas, Mr. SHEPPARD, be assigned as a member thereof.

WORK ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, during the war practically all the work on reclamation projects that was under way at the beginning of the war was stopped. The war, for practical purposes, is over. All the plans and specifications for this work are prepared, and if money were available work could be commenced at once and employment could be furnished. It seems to me it would be one of the most practical methods of furnishing a reservoir for labor and employment if money could be made available for carrying of these projects. For that purpose I propose an amendment, which I intend to offer to the sundry civil appropriation bill, making available $50,000,000. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands for its report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so referred.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments. I am about to introduce a bill which is of such tremendous and pressing importance that while it is under consideration by the committee I want Senators to give it their individual thought, so that we may be prepared, if a report of the committee is secured, to act upon it some time during the present session of Congress.

The President took possession of the railroads of the United States on the 29th day of December, 1917. The possession was assumed under an act of Congress passed in August, I think, in 1916. On the 21st day of March, 1918, a bill was passed by Congress and approved by the President providing for the operation of the railroad systems of the United States and for the compensation which should be paid to their several owners. Section 14 of that act provides:

That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and for a reasonable time thereafter, which shall not exceed one year and nine months next following the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace: Provided, however, That the President may, prior to July 1, 1918, relinquish control of all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation, further Federal control of which the President shall deem not needful or desirable; and the President may at any time during the period of Federal control agree with the owners thereof to relinquish all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation. The President may relinquish all railroads and systems of transportation under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable. No right to compensation shall accrue to such owners from and after the date of relinquishment for the property so relinquished.

In the latter part of 1918 the Director General of Railroads, Mr. Secretary McAdoo, recommended that the period of control be extended to five years after the declaration of peace, and that recommendation is now under consideration by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, and I think it is under consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House.

When the Director General appeared before the committee of the Senate he stated in a rather clear and understandable way that if Congress did not extend the period of Federal control according to his recommendation—that is, for five years after the declaration of peace—it was probable, at least, that the railroad systems would be returned to their owners at the close of this session. I do not mean to say that he declared this intention specifically.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I only say that no other fair interpretation could be put upon his statement before the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not have his language before me, but my understanding was that he simply expressed his personal view as to what ought to be done, not that it would be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is quite correct. The Director General did not attempt to commit the President to the view which he expressed, but inasmuch as the successor of the Director General, Mr. Hines, has publicly stated that his policies will be the same as the policies of Mr. McAdoo, we may assume that it is the purpose of the Director General of Railroads to return these properties to their owners at the end, or very soon after the end, of this session if Congress does not extend the period for five years.

It is my opinion that Congress will not extend the period for five years. It is the overwhelming weight of opinion of bankers and railroad men and of all other thoughtful persons who have communicated their views in any way that to return these properties to their owners without further legislation, without some provision to care for their necessities and for the necessities of the people as well, would be a universal disaster. It is the judgment of those who understand this subject best that if these roads are returned to their owners before Congress shall legislate in some wise way upon the subject, more than one-third of all the mileage of the United States will be in the hands of receivers within 60 days after the return takes place.

I think we all believe—the members of the committee I am speaking of now—that we can propose to Congress a plan and a permanent policy for the readjustment or reorganization of the relation between the railroads and the Government within a few months, and it is our belief that Congress will be able within the year to agree upon some enduring general permanent system for the control of these highways of commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose the Senator's statement is upon the assumption that there will be a special session?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not altogether on that assumption, although I believe there ought to be a special session; I believe that there must be a special session; but even if there is no special or extra session, if the Committees on Interstate Commerce are permitted to do their work during the interim and be ready to report at the next regular session, we can within a year compose all the differences on this subject and present to the people a permanent policy in that regard.

In view of these circumstances—and they are very grave; their seriousness can not be overestimated or exaggerated—I introduce a bill which I shall read, so that Senators can see in the RECORD what it is. This is a substitute for section 14, which I read in the beginning of my observations:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the above act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and for one year and nine months next following the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless Congress otherwise directs.

"No right to compensation shall accrue to such owners from and after the date of the relinquishment of the property so relinquished, whether returned at the end of said period or sooner by direction of Congress."

The effect of this measure, if passed, gives the country 21 months after the war to adopt such legislation as it desires. That is the limit as it is under the present law for Government possession, but in the meantime it is to be hoped that Congress will have acted and that some new, comprehensive, and, I think, equitable plan can be adopted which will be accepted as a permanent policy in this country.

I have made these remarks because if we do not pass this bill, or something in the nature of this bill, and if the President shall be guided by the advice of his Director General and return these properties in their present condition and under the existing circumstances to their owners, the United States will see a cataclysm in finance as well as in railroad operation such as it has never witnessed before.

I earnestly hope that the Members of the Senate will give such thought to this subject as will enable them to act promptly in whatever way their consciences and judgment direct upon any report which the Committee on Interstate Commerce may present.

I introduce the bill of which I have been speaking and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 5432) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I present for reading and reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections the following communication.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask that it be read?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the communication was read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

JANUARY 23, 1919.

To the honorable UNITED STATES SENATE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS:

Truman H. Newberry, of Grosse Point Farms, Wayne County, Mich., respectfully represents unto your honorable body as follows:

He is advised that you either have reported or are about to report to the Senate for favorable action Senate resolution 415, providing in substance for an investigation into and recount of the recent senatorial election in the State of Michigan, and he submits the following for the consideration of your honorable body:

1. This Senate has no jurisdiction to take up the matters involved in said resolution.

(a) The constitutional provision that the Senate shall be the sole judge of the qualification and election of its own members does not refer to this Senate, but to the Senate to which a man has been elected.

(b) No certificate of election or similar credentials, the outgrowth of the recent Michigan senatorial election, is now before this body, nor under existing conditions is it at present intended to present such credentials to this Senate.

Should your honorable body disagree with this jurisdictional position, then, before the ballots and the election history of 2,100 voting precincts scattered over 83 counties in the State of Michigan shall be examined, it is respectfully submitted that some facts should be proven preliminary to the adoption of such a program. If permission were given for a preliminary hearing attention will be called to the following facts and circumstances:

2. The petition upon which this resolution has been based, it will be noticed, is entirely a petition upon information and belief; in other words, it is entirely hearsay, and if the allegations in the petition could be corroborated they surely would be for the following reasons:

(a) Since the election a great many agents, attorneys, and detectives on behalf of Mr. Henry Ford have traveled up and down the State of Michigan collecting evidence. They have represented themselves to be members of the American Protective League, the representatives of the Department of Justice, and the representatives of Truman H. Newberry. They have examined poll books and poll lists in nearly every county. They have had access to the election returns in nearly every county. In some cases it is said they have had access to the ballots themselves. As an illustration of their methods the situation in the city of Grand Rapids is an example in point. The United States district attorney for the western district of Michigan is Myron H. Walker, a Democratic appointee. Mr. Walker, with no grand jury proceedings pending and no commissioner conducting an examination, summoned a large number of witnesses formally and informally to his office and took their statements frequently before a stenographer representing the Ford interests. He at times would issue a note in his own handwriting directing persons to come to his office. At other times he would use a blank form used by the Department of Justice or by the American Protective League to get people in his office, and frequently these illegal and improper summonses he caused would be served by volunteer women Red Cross workers, driving Red Cross ambulances in the city of Grand Rapids, who, of course, had no consciousness of the political uses to which their patriotic services were being put. If methods of this description produced proof, this proof and not mere hearsay should be laid before the Senate before the elaborate program now contemplated is undertaken.

3. All the ballots, poll books, and election history in the State of Michigan is now in a state of perpetual preservation under final injunctions issued by the two United States courts in the State of Michigan, by virtue of a stipulation entered into between counsel for Henry Ford and Truman H. Newberry, so that there is now no proof of this description which will not be available for the new Senate, the proper body, if it determines there are facts which warrant an investigation or a recount.

4. In connection with the requested recount attention should be called to the following facts:

(a) The campaign put up in Michigan on behalf of Mr. Henry Ford can be shown to have been generally regarded as the most elaborate, expensive, and pretentious in the history of the State.

(b) In every county an elaborate newspaper advertising campaign was carried on at an apparently tremendous expense.

(c) In every county literature was freely distributed through the mails by messenger boys and even to handbills.

(d) A most elaborate and pretentious billboard campaign was conducted throughout the State of Michigan, the expense of which must have run into very large figures.

(e) A very expensive, elaborate, and pretentious booklet was prepared and distributed to a number estimated at about a half a million. Testimony from all over the State can be produced indicating that this pamphlet was mailed to every voter in the State of Michigan, and in some cases to the same voter on two, three, or four occasions. It is believed it can be shown that the cost of printing this pamphlet alone must have been $75,000, that postage on this one piece of literature must have been from $10,000 to $15,000, and the cost of addressing and distributing would bring this one item alone, so far as expense is concerned, into extremely large figures. There can be no doubt of its political effect.

(f) Two occasions, at least, can be shown where Democratic postmasters had mail carriers distributing Ford literature the Sunday before election and witholding other mail from distribution until the Ford political mail a day or two before election had been distributed.

(g) It will be further shown that outside of Wayne County, in which is located the city of Detroit, the majority of Truman H. Newberry over Henry Ford was approximately 45,000. The normal Republican majority (including the city of Detroit) is approximately 30,000, yet Mr. Ford carried Wayne County by over 35,000 majority. In bringing about this peculiar, remarkable political upset it will be shown that Ford workers in great numbers were around nearly every booth with literature, cards, and banners; automobiles carrying his workers around labeled with appropriate banners were never so thick. Out of approximately 300 voting precincts in the city of Detroit approximately 40 are precincts notoriously known as politically controlled. It will be shown that in each and everyone of the precincts of this description Mr. Ford carried them by a majority running as high as 2, 3, and 4 to 1, although Republican candidates had like majorities in a great many of such precincts.

(h) It will be shown in some precincts that the Ford workers insisted on voting men who were not registered; in some cases men whose citizenship was doubted.

(i) In addition to this political organization so built up it will be shown that there is a Ford agent for the sale of Ford cars in nearly every hamlet in the State of Michigan. These Ford agents were in nearly all cases made the political headquarters of the Ford campaign, the place from which workers were furnished cars and literature, thus affording a semivolunteer organization unparalleled.

It is because of facts and circumstances as above enumerated that it is believed it can be demonstrated that the major portion of the political activity and expenditures of money on the election was done on behalf of Mr. Ford, who some time after the election in an authorized published statement said in effect the election was free from any irregularities.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
By J. O. MURFIN,
His Attorney at Law and in Fact.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, has the morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The morning business has been closed. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13274, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, this measure is one of very great importance to the country, involving as it does the validation and payment of contracts amounting to $1,600,000,000, and possibly $2,000,000,000. In view of its importance, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Hitchcock	McNary	Spencer
Borah	Hollis	Martin, Va.	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	New	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Penrose	Trammell
Fletcher	Kenyon	Pittman	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	King	Pomerene	Warren
Gay	Knox	Shafroth	Watson
Gronna	La Follette	Sheppard	Weeks
Hardwick	Lenroot	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Henderson	McKellar	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. HALE, Mr. HARDING, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. LODGE, Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky, Mr. MOSES, Mr. NELSON, Mr. POLLOCK, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. SMITH of Arizona answered to their names when called.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, as I stated awhile ago, this is a measure of very great importance, and I do hope that Senators will undertake to reach a proper solution of the question, which involves something like $1,600,000,000, and possibly more. It grows out of section 3744 of the Revised Statutes, or the failure of the departments to observe the provisions of that statute in the making of so-called war contracts. In order to get the matter before the Senate in proper shape I am going to ask to have the Secretary read into the RECORD section 3744 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Secretary of the Interior to cause and require every contract made by them severally on behalf of the Government or by their officers under them appointed to make such contracts, to be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof, a copy of which shall be filed by the officer making and signing the contract in the Returns Office of the Department of the Interior as soon after the contract is made as possible and within 30 days, together with all bids, offers, and proposals to him made by persons to obtain the same, and with a copy of any advertisement he may have published inviting bids, offers, or proposals for the same. All the copies and paper in relation to each contract shall be attached together by a ribbon and sealed and marked by numbers in regular order according to the number of papers composing the whole return.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are certain other sections following the one just read to which I deem it unnecessary to call particular attention at this time. It so happened that during the progress of the war many contracts were entered into where the formalities of the section just read were entirely complied with; but as the emergencies grew and demand for many of the supplies which were necessary for the successful prosecution of the war became more insistent the War Department and its officers and agents began to disregard the provision of the statute. It happened that many supplies, munitions, and in fact everything needed were ordered by letter, some by telephone and telegraph, and I believe in some instances by appeals made on the ground by representatives of the Government to men who were engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other supplies, appealing to their patriotism to go ahead and manufacture the things that were needed by the Government. In nearly every case, and I think possibly in every case where this appeal was made to men who were familiar with the requirements of the statute, it was complied with, and men of large means, and frequently men of small means, individuals, firms, and corporations proceeded to manufacture without having any form of contract executed with the Government, relying upon the justice and integrity of purpose of the Government officials to see to it that they were paid later on.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Oregon has referred to the informality of many of the contracts. If he will permit me,

I should like to submit another instance that was called to my attention some time ago, in which a representative of the Government waited upon a manufacturer, found that his plant was especially well equipped for a certain product, and this manufacturer did not then care to take up that line of manufacture. The Government official said to him if he did not do it they would immediately commandeer his plant. Of course, the manufacturer only desired to do his full duty toward his country, and he took up this line of work, and now he is met with the statement that his contract was illegal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have the Senator call attention to that, but it is only one illustration of a great many. In any event the War Department, I think, was undertaking to reach an adjustment of invalid or in many instances irregular contracts when the the Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Warwick, rendered a decision which stopped the negotiations for the adjustment of contracts, or practically stopped them, because in effect he held that they could not be paid even if an ascertainment was had as to the amount due from the Government to the contractor.

This has resulted, Mr. President, in great confusion. There was probably no question about the legality of the ruling of Mr. Warwick. It not only resulted in confusion in this country but in France and Great Britain, where there were many contracts being performed by these Governments or by their citizens. In many cases consent to their cancellation was agreed to by the authorities there. It was impossible for our Government to do anything toward the adjustment of these contracts, because there was no way to pay them after the adjustments had been reached. The result has been, as the testimony shows in the hearings before our committee, that in some instances the French Government and individuals in France and in Great Britain are proceeding to carry out the terms of the irregular contracts which they had, which consisted merely of an order and an acceptance upon the part of the manufacturer to perform their part of the contract, and the whole proceeding of settlement has been stopped.

Mr. President, without going into details I call attention to the fact that after the decision of the comptroller the War Industries Board had prepared and sent up to be introduced in Congress a bill which would validate these irregular contracts. That bill was introduced on the 5th day of December, 1918, by myself at the request of the War Department. That bill was referred to the Military Affairs Committee and was taken up for consideration, with the result that a subsequent bill introduced in the Senate under date of January 2, 1919, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and referred to the committee, was reported out by the Committee on Military Affairs, as probably the best bill on the subject up to that time.

Later on the committee reconsidered its action with reference to this question. They heard further evidence about the whole situation, and subsequently, on the 9th day of January, authorized the chairman of the committee to report out a substitute for any bills that might be pending, or, rather, as an amendment to be taken up in whatever way the parliamentary situation permitted.

Still later, Mr. President, the committee, without further action than as above stated upon any of these bills, had referred to it House bill 13274. It is now Order of Business 597 on the Senate Calendar. It was known as the Dent bill, and had for its purpose the same object the bills which I have just been mentioning. Then the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate reported out as a substitute for the so-called Dent bill another bill which embodied what is conceived to be the best features of the bills I have just been discussing. That bill was reported to the Senate on the 13th day of January, striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting therefor the bill which the Senate Military Affairs Committee agreed upon. That is the bill which is now before the Senate.

I do not know that there is more I desire to say with reference to the matter now, but I suppose it will be discussed quite at length, and I may have something to say about it later.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question in reference to the first portion of the bill validating contracts that have been defectively executed or not executed in compliance with the law. I want to ask the Senator whether in his opinion this would make a valid contract so that the contractor would be able to claim and receive unearned profits? In other words, here is a contract for, we will say, $10,000,000 worth of munitions. Only $1,000,000 worth of it has been received. The Government could not be held to pay the profit upon the $9,000,000 which it had not received in munitions? I ask the Senator whether under this language it would not so validate that procurement order, for it may have been only in the form of a procurement order, that the contractor would receive his entire profit upon the $10,000,000 worth of munitions, although he had not earned a profit except upon $1,000,000 worth?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator ask whether the bill is drawn in such a way as to permit that?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The testimony before the committee shows that it was not the intention to have the profits the Senator speaks of paid.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the Senator's opinion as to the bill properly guarding the Government against that situation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the bill is broad enough to protect the Government. It seems to me there is a clause in it that does do that very thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I call his attention to the language on page 5 of the bill:

> The Secretary of War is authorized and directed, on behalf of the Government, to enter into such contract with such individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign Government as will, under all the circumstances, fairly and equitably compensate him or it for the expenditures made, obligations incurred, equipment, materials, or supplies furnished or acquired, or services rendered, as aforesaid.

It excludes any pay for anticipated or speculative profits.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be true, but that only relates to the cases described in that paragraph where no contract had been entered into. The preceding paragraph, concerning which I now direct my inquiry, is where the contract has been made but not fully executed in compliance with the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator in reference to that, that the first section applies to those contracts where they have been signed, but not technically properly signed.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. When we give them by this act a proper signing the rights of the party are dependent upon those written contracts which the contractor has already signed, and, of course, the Government is bound by that.

Mr. LENROOT. That would be true if the first paragraph was limited to contracts of that character; but the very first paragraph also validates all procurement orders that have been accepted.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is the second paragraph.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the first. The language is:

> When such agreement anticipated procurement order, and such agreement was reduced to the form of a contract or accepted procurement order and executed or signed on behalf of the Government.

I understand all the contracts do provide for cancellation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Those procurement orders are in writing also, and the Government is bound by the procurement order in the same way as in a contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Am I correct in my understanding that where the contract was actually made it has in all cases provided for cancellation?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has; that is my understanding.

I want to say to the Senator that there are thousands of these contracts improperly signed, and they have changed the verbiage of the contracts from time to time. I have never seen all of them, but I am informed that they all provide——

Mr. LENROOT. I mean that that is the practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the case, although they provide for cancellation.

Mr. WEEKS. I remember that the matter was brought up in the committee and that question was asked, and much to my surprise I think the opinion was furnished the committee that all contracts did not contain the cancellation clause.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct as to the first contract, and that was the testimony before the committee, as the Senator from Massachusetts has described; but later on they had a form of contract, which was stated to be the standard form of contract, in which cancellation was provided. So, as I said, even the written contract is involved in a good deal of doubt.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I take it, it is admitted that under the language in the first paragraph, as the bill stands, it will bind the Government to pay the full price or the profits that would have been realized upon the canceled portions of the contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not think that would be the case at all. I will state what the bill does. The first paragraph is to bind the Government to precisely the same written contract, called either a contract or a procurement order, that its agents signed, but signed improperly.

Mr. LENROOT. I agree to that; but does the Senator think where such a contract has been made by anyone without any provision for cancellation the Government should be held to a validation of that contract, compelling the Government to pay unearned profits?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very frank to say to the Senator I do not, and if he has an amendment to offer making it certain that no prospective or speculative profits are to be considered, I shall take great pleasure in making it clear, so far as my vote can do so. I thought there was a specific statement in this bill on that subject. There was one in the bill that our subcommittee prepared.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator then would not object to a general provision being placed in the bill that no unearned profits shall be awarded in the adjustment of any of these contracts?

Mr. McKELLAR. That would depend on the kind of profits, but no unearned profits, surely.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I call the Senator's attention to the authority given the Secretary of War in lines 7 and 8, and so on, upon page 5? The authority is "to enter into such contract with such individual, firm, company, corporation, * * * as will, under all the circumstances, fairly and equitably compensate him or it for the expenditures made, obligations incurred"——

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will examine a little further, he will see that that applies only to one class of cases. It is the first paragraph I am now speaking of.

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, I see.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not covered by that at all. That validates the contracts as they stand, although defectively executed.

Mr. FLETCHER. All the Government is there authorized to do is to waive noncompliance.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. That makes the obligation on the Government whatever it might be.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not obligate the Government to make a contract that requires the Government to go on and reverse its entire policy.

Mr. LENROOT. If we waive the defective execution of the contract, we validate that contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that, of course, it was the argument of those contractors who appeared before the committee that the Government having made a written contract with them, it should be bound by it, even though it was defectively executed by the Government's own agent. The Senator must see that there is weight in that argument. On the other hand, it was the contractor's duty, as it seems to me, to see that he had a contract that was properly executed by the Government agent, as well as the Government's duty to see to that same thing. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that if we give this particular kind of a written contract a higher and better position than the classes of contracts in the second paragraph, we are doing an injustice to those who did not have written contracts. For that reason I am willing to support an amendment which the Senator or some one may offer on that subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a provision also that the Secretary of War shall find whether or not it is consistent with the public interest.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think that that would go to the question of unearned profits.

Mr. WEEKS. May I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that these men have no valid contracts, and the purpose is to validate a contract so that a claim may be made. They have no case in court as the matter now stands. Being given a case in court, then the extent of the payment to them is a matter of determination to be reached through the machinery which has been provided in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. But if the contract is validated to the full extent, then they have a legal claim.

Mr. WEEKS. Not unless they have a completed claim. Of course, if they had completed only one-tenth of the contract there would be no basis for a claim for the profits on the other nine-tenths.

Mr. LENROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon, if the Government canceled it, through no fault of their own, certainly the general rule of law would be that they would be entitled to the profits they would have received.

Mr. WEEKS. The Government in ordinary cases always retains the power of cancellation. It had failed to do so in some cases until the matter was brought to the attention of the department by the Committee on Appropriations. After that all contracts did contain it.

Mr. LENROOT. But the objection I am making to the bill is that if it applied to contracts alone I do not think any great danger would exist; but it validates procurement orders that have been accepted, which, of course, do not contain the cancellation clause.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think that anyone would object to protecting the Government in the payment of unearned earnings.

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate that.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it is protected, but, so far as I am concerned, I would not object to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I should like to state that I just received a telegram this morning of protest from long-staple cotton raisers in Arizona and southern California in regard to the importation now of many thousands of bales of long-staple cotton. These men have been prohibited, I understand, by rulings of the Government from the sale of their cotton at all. They have now on hand two years of cotton that was selling at 70 cents or over in the market. That sale has been prohibited by the action of the Government. The War Trade Board is now permitting the importation of tons and tons of Egyptian long-staple cotton, bringing the price down beyond the power of raising cotton on the lands of which I speak. It seems to me if there is any equity in any of this measure, and I have no doubt there is great equity in the purposes of the bill, these people should not be neglected.

I do not know how to get at it except by a bill preventing the importation of long-staple cotton until the cotton now on hand that the Government prevented the sale of when the raiser could get his price for it has been disposed of.

With the many ramifications that the whole question contains, I know if I introduce a bill to stop the importation of long-staple cotton for this year, which would permit the sale of this cotton, I would find very great difficulty in getting that bill through both Houses of Congress between now and the 4th day of next March. I see from the humor the suggestion causes the very impossibility of the suggestion even; but I wanted to know if there are any cases in this bill touching on that peculiar class of equity outside of any contractual relations; and if so, I should like to have an amendment put in somewhere to protect these people in their cotton, which has been absolutely confiscated as far as their profits are concerned.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state to the Senator that there is not anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, further in reference to "prospective or possible profits," especially I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin and of other Senators to section 6 of the bill which is known as the Hitchcock bill, which was prepared by our subcommittee and reported out of the full committee; and I desire for just a moment to explain what that means. It is a little different from the bill which has since been reported by the committee, known as the Chamberlain bill. The committee at first reported out what is known as the Hitchcock bill, which provided for a commission to take charge of the settlement of these claims and to pass upon them. I think, as a matter of fact, when Senators come to consider the matter here they will agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and myself that that is the wisest bill. I especially desire to call Senators' attention to section 6 of the Hitchcock bill, which reads:

> That in no case, however, shall any award either by the commission or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies received and actually delivered to the United States, and a remuneration for expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. LENROOT, and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Am I right in understanding that the words "for expenses necessarily incurred" include the cost of any additional equipment and machinery or plants or buildings or anything of that sort?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course that is true. It is the purpose of this section, I will say to the Senator, to exclude the kind of profits that were spoken of awhile ago by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I thought that that particular provision was in the pending bill as reported by the committee; but I find that it is contained in what is known as the Hitchcock bill. It ought to be embodied in whatever bill is passed, of course, beyond the shadow of a doubt. I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I simply desire to say that I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, that if section 6 is incorporated as a part of this bill it will fully cover the case and protect the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to Senators that I intend to offer that section as an amendment to the pending bill, of course not on behalf of the committee, but I shall have to do it personally. Now I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I was just about to ask the Senator from Tennessee as to whether or not the Hitchcock bill provided that the commission, in the first instance, instead of the Secretary of War, should pass upon the contracts, as provided in the pending bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to explain that to the Senator. The Senator from Nebraska is going to explain it later, but, if he will permit me, I will answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota.

The Hitchcock bill was prepared by a subcommittee composed of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and myself. We took testimony and we heard the whole matter; we reported the bill back to the committee; and the committee reported it to the Senate favorably. There was objection to the bill, however, on the part of the War Department, because it was claimed by the department that it took the entire settlement of these contracts out of the hands of that department. At a matter of fact, it did place the whole matter of settling these contracts in the hands of the independent commission proposed to be appointed under the terms of the bill. Our authority for the appointment of such a commission was the commission which was appointed after the Spanish-American War, which we had been informed worked very well indeed. Most of the contractors, I think, were substantially in favor of that. The bill as passed by the other House merely directed the Secretary of War to go ahead and settle these contracts, his opinion and determination of the matter to be final. Of course, this does not mean that the Secretary himself settles these contracts. It practically means anyone in his department. The contractors were not, however, willing to have that done, because it left an arbitrary power in the hands of one man which might be performed by any officer—by a second lieutenant, a first lieutenant, or a major, or whoever he might be—and that would be the end of it. In view of that objection, this amendment was framed by the committee, of which I have spoken, composed of the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from New Jersey, and myself. We provided that a commission should have original jurisdiction, should take entire charge, should have the right to appoint subcommittees or agents to take proof where necessary in localities where the contracts had been made, at the situs of the contract or of the contractees, that they should report to the commission, that then the commission should have the right to pay down 75 per cent of the amount claimed to be due, and if the contractors were not satisfied they would have the right to go into the Court of Claims for the other 25 per cent. We thought that was absolutely fair, and I still think it is fair and the best plan yet offered.

I believe—and I understand the Senator from Nebraska is of the same opinion—that, with one or two amendments added, that would be the best bill of all three, including, of course, the House bill, for I do not think anyone will contend that the House bill is right. I do not think even the War Department is satisfied with that bill. Surely it is not the bill that ought to be passed by the Senate. The Hitchcock bill comes nearer being the right thing, because it puts the matter in the hands of an independent commission to settle these contracts as equity may require. We want to be absolutely fair to the contractor, and, at the same time, we want to be absolutely fair to the Government; and we believe that under the terms of the Hitchcock substitute the Government's rights would be carefully guarded and at the same time the rights of the contractors would be absolutely and fairly and squarely guarded.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Tennessee is now speaking in behalf of the substitute.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that there was a good deal of dissatisfaction with the Hitchcock substitute after it was reported by the committee. A committee of contractors came down here. They were very fair-minded men, and, by the way, aided us very greatly. They made suggestions about the matter which were very valuable. As a matter of fact, a new substitute was reported thereafter by the committee which embodied the House bill plan and under which the Secretary of War is to go ahead and work it out as best he can, and there is then given the right of appeal to a commission to be created. That is under the last substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. How is the commission to be created?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It is to consist of three men—one from the War Department, one from the Department of Justice, and one from general business. I think if the Senator from Idaho will examine into the matter he will find that every safeguard has been used in reference to this commission.

The principal point of difference between the two plans is under the Hitchcock substitute the commission is given original jurisdiction to pass on all these claims, and it is directed to pay 75 per cent of them at once, which I think is a very proper thing, because many concerns will be likely to go into bankruptcy unless some sort of arrangement of that kind can be made. If a contractor is dissatisfied as to the other 25 per cent, he has the right of appeal to the Court of Claims, just as is provided by law in other cases. I think that is entirely proper.

The substitute, I will say to the Senator, if he will excuse me just a moment, provides that all preliminary work shall be done by the department and that either the Government or the contractor has the right to appeal from the ruling of the department to this commission. In other words, the commission in the substitute which I will call the Chamberlain substitute, the last bill reported, makes the commission an appellate body, while the Hitchcock substitute makes it a body of original jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Government and the individual contractors both have the right of appeal?

Mr. McKELLAR. Both have the right of appeal. By the way, I want to call the Senator's attention to that, because it was a somewhat disputed matter in committee as to whether or not the Government ought to have the right of appeal. I think it absolutely essential that the Government, as well as the contractors, should have the right of appeal from the decision of the department.

Mr. BORAH. Whose business would it be to take such an appeal on behalf of the Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Department of Justice.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, there is this feature about the matter to which I should like to call the Senator's attention. If the representative on this commission of the Department of Justice agrees with the Secretary of War in his award there can be no appeal on the part of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I was thinking about.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that this is about the best way the matter could be worked out; but if the Senator has any better way to give the Government an appeal, I for one will cheerfully accept it, for I desire to say that it was the earnest purpose of every member of the subcommittee and of the full committee to get a system of validating these contracts which would be fair to the contractor and as absolutely fair to the Government. In my judgment, we must protect both, and that is the committee's judgment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, why not create a tribunal wholly separate and apart from the Government, composed of men who are not in any wise associated with the Government, so that we should have a tribunal passing upon the matter without violating either directly or indirectly the principle that a man shall not sit upon his own case?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Idaho feels that way about the matter—and I agree with him heartily, for I am going to vote that way—then he should vote for the Hitchcock amendment. I am going to vote for the Hitchcock amendment first, and I will say that I endeavored to amend the committee substitute to provide the best method that we could.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I am advised that there are about 6,000 of these contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are a good many more than that number.

Mr. POMERENE. I was told the other day that there would be about 25 per cent of them in which there would be considerable dispute. The so-called Hitchcock bill provides for one trial commission. Assuming that there are 300 working days in the year, the commission would be occupied for a whole year if it tried and decided five cases a day. I know a good many of these manufacturers are very much embarrassed financially now; they need the money due them; and they need it right away. If many of them are to be held up for a goodly portion of a year before they can get an adjustment, we shall have financial ruin staring many of them in the face.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator feels that way about it, I repeat he should vote for the Hitchcock amendment, and vote for it quickly, and we should pass it just as soon as we can and have it enacted into law. These contractors can get 75 per cent of their claims right away, and they can get the entire amount if they come to an agreement with the commission. I presume in 95 per cent, perhaps in 97 per cent, of the cases they will have no trouble about coming to such an agreement. I agree with the Senator that it ought to be done, and ought to be quickly done. I do not agree with the Senator about the Hitchcock plan taking so much time. I think probably 98 per cent of the cases will be adjusted by agreement without any trouble.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean by the payment of 75 per cent of the claim 75 per cent of the amount which is found due by the commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Ohio a question before he took his seat. I think the Senator has raised a very proper point for consideration when he suggests that speedy determination of these claims might be the means of saving some men from bankruptcy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. But would not the same condition follow if the bill as reported by the committee were adopted, for must not somebody hear the evidence and pass upon it?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, that is true, and, while I have not matured my own thoughts on the subject, my tentative idea was that perhaps there ought to be two or more of these commissions to sit concurrently.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator—because it is being overlooked in the discussion—that there was not a business man or representative of a business body who appeared before the committee who did not say that the so-called Hitchcock bill would delay proceedings, and that if there was a start made in the adjustment of these claims before the 1st of July under that bill it would be doing well. Not only that, but the War Department itself through its representative, Mr. Crowell, a most excellent clear-sighted business man, claimed that under the system proposed in that bill the work could not be commenced before July.

As has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] there are many men who, unless there can be a speedy adjustment of these matters, must go into bankruptcy, because they have all their liquid capital in the business and the banks will not loan them any money until there has been some certification somewhere, either by the Government or some of its boards, that these contracts are going to be paid at some time in some way, in part or in full.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, how does the Hitchcock substitute delay the matter if we assume that somebody must examine the evidence and hear controversies and pass upon them?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to say in perfect frankness to Senators that not one of these measures appeals to me in its entirety, but it is a critical emergency which confronts the business of the country and I have yielded my judgment on many propositions in order to try to reach results.

The trouble about the Hitchcock commission plan is that the commission to be created is to proceed de novo. The War Department plan—and that is the plan embodied in this bill, practically—contemplates the utilization of the 32 boards already functioning in the different regional districts. Those boards have heard the testimony and practically in many cases have agreed with the contractors as to the amount of their claims, and I do not think there is any contention that their adjustments are irregular or unjust.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should consider the objection to that as being that these boards are practically in a large measure directly or indirectly settling their own affairs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I may disabuse the Senator's mind of that impression, Mr. Crowell, at page 54 of his testimony, tells how those boards are constituted, and if the Senator will permit me, as the extract is short, I will read it. It is as follows:

> We have 32 boards now functioning on this thing. Our idea was to decentralize it, so as to get speedy action and so as to get the men best in touch and who have been closest in touch with the production under these contracts. The Ordnance Department has 12 boards, and those are headed in each case by the district ordnance officer, who is in every case a man of large experience, a civilian who has been expediting and watching production in his center for a considerable period of time past. He has made up boards, which have been approved in Washington, of four or five members each. They are largely officers of the Ordnance Department, but each board has an average of one civilian from the outside. In some cases he is a prominent attorney, and in some cases he is a member of the War Industries Board, in some cases representing the War Industries Board in that particular district. The orders relating to the quartermaster supplies are being handled in the same way by 12 boards, which are functioning now in the 12 zones into which the Quartermaster Department has divided the country. There are, then, eight boards functioning in Washington, each on some specialty, such as chemical warfare service or aircraft, so that we have 32 of these boards now functioning.

I will say to the Senator that in some instances they have still larger boards functioning, where there has been great industrial activity on behalf of the War Department and where many civilians are connected with the boards.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I understand that the difference between the measure proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the measure reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is this: There are 25,000 contracts under the War Department, 6,000 of which are informal, verbal contracts, or contracts that have not the signature of the statutory official. Those 6,000 contracts must be validated. They amount to $1,700,000,000. The remaining 19,000 contracts are legal contracts conforming to law, and there is no dispute in regard to them. I understand that the Hitchcock bill provides that the commission to be created shall settle de novo all of the questions involved in these contracts. The War Department say that the 19,000 contracts in which they are in agreement with the contractors it is unnecessary to refer to the proposed appellate board. The bill reported by the committee, known as the War Industries Board plan, permits the War Department to settle those contracts first.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has just referred to 19,000 contracts concerning which, as I understand him, there can be no dispute as to their validity. Those contracts or at least many of them have not yet been completed. What is the War Department doing with respect to them? Is it canceling these contracts, and, if so, upon what terms? Is it paying the full profit whether the contract has been completed or not? I am asking the question for information only.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as I understand, the War Department has its machinery already in operation in connection with these claims. I have here a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, from which I read the following:

> The War Department already has established and at work a machinery adequate to handle efficiently and promptly all settlements. Without now going into the details the department has a central board of contract review in each of the eight supply bureaus in Washington; also a total of 24 local or district boards in various sections of the country making settlements for the Ordnance Department and the former Quartermaster Corps. The department has also established in Washington a board of contract adjustment to which the Secretary of War refers for decision all cases in which the contractor and the contracting officer are unable to agree. Furthermore, several thousand contracting officers, accountants, investigators, and other assistants are now at work helping the boards to make prompt settlements. On the enactment of the legislation which the War Department has requested, this machinery is prepared to start immediately on the cases in which contracts were not made or signed as provided by law.
> The War Department feels very earnestly that the good faith of the Government is pledged to a prompt settlement and payment of all just claims of contractors. The department stands fully ready to make such settlements and is already doing so where the contracts were made and signed as provided by law.

In a statement from the United States Chamber of Commerce forwarded to me under date of January 2, they say that subsequently the officials of the War Department have reported 669 agreements out of the 6,000.

I feel that the bill should provide that the War Department should settle these contracts, provided they can come to an agreement with the contractors through the machinery that they have in the War Department, and then, if there is any conflict or difference of opinion between the contractors and the War Department they can appeal to the tribunal to be created which will stand between the War Department and the Court of Claims, whose processes are so slow. What the contractors want is to know that if they fail to agree with the War Department they will have some tribunal to which they can submit their claims.

Is it necessary to refer to the proposed commission all of the claims?

The War Department made these contracts; but many of them are agreements verbally made, and there are disagreements as to the termination provision. As to some contracts, they have not been able to get any agreement as to termination because of the fact that they had to be so hastily made. Why not let the War Department go as far as they can go in the settlement? If the two parties agree, let the department dispose of the contracts where agreement is had, and where they do not agree, let the matter be referred to the proposed tribunal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think in that behalf there is no difference between the Senator from New Jersey and myself. I agree with him that if these contracts can be settled on any equitable basis at all they should be settled by the War Department; but the thing that has troubled me most has been the fact that there are a large number of contracts which are in dispute, and I have feared that under the proposal here made it would perhaps be a year before many of these contracts could be adjudicated, if I can properly use that term. The machinery that is adopted here is the matter of greatest concern to me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, does the Senator refer to the committee bill?

Mr. POMERENE. I was referring to the commission which is provided to try the disputed claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The committee bill provides that the War Department through its machinery shall settle these contracts first. Of course, if they are in agreement with the contractor, there will be no reference to the proposed commission. As I understand, under the Hitchcock bill all of these contracts are to be referred to the commission.

Mr. POMERENE. I have seen a good many cases tried which the attorney said would only take one day to try, particularly where a building contract or something of that character was involved, when it subsequently developed that they would take two or three weeks before they had completed the case. If there is to be any experience of that kind before the one commission which is provided here, I am afraid we will not live to see the end of these proceedings.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the Senator's time, but in reference to the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I should like to say that the committee bill recognizes the organization already established under the War Department for the settlement of these claims. That organization exists now; it has been in operation, and it is believed that a large majority of these claims can be settled by that organization, with the approval of the War Department.

If the contractor in any instance is not satisfied with the settlement arrived at, he can appeal to the board created by the bill. There is also a provision that in the event the Government, through a representative of the Department of Justice, should object to the settlement the Government may appeal to the board.

I do not think there will be any delay such as the Senator from Ohio fears in the settlement of these claims under the provisions of the committee bill. The Hitchcock bill, as I understand, involves the creation of a new organization; it does not take advantage of the organization already established and in operation. I do not think, therefore, that the Senator would find that there can be any serious delay under the establishment provided for in the committee bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BECKHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. My understanding is—and I will ask the Senator if his is the same—that almost all of these contracts have been under consideration and their settlement arranged for, except as stopped by the comptroller's decision.

Mr. BECKHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. So that the preliminary work is all done.

Mr. BECKHAM. That is my recollection.

Mr. WARREN. And it is now a mere matter of closing legally that which has already been arranged.

Mr. BECKHAM. That is my understanding.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the Senator from New Jersey who has the floor must yield to some one particularly, if he desires to yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have finished. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Ohio that possibly some of these cases will take a long time to settle; but if you provide, as the Military Affairs Committee bill provides, that the War Department, who made these contracts, and who have all of the facts concerning them, particularly the verbal contracts and the contracts for procurement orders by telephone, are allowed to settle them, you will practically dispose of three-quarters of the contracts, because they are in agreement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me see if I understand the Senator correctly. He makes the statement now that these parties are in agreement with the Government. Does he mean as to the amount that is to be paid, and that that is only to depend upon the legislation validating these contracts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; as I understand, many of these contracts are already signed, but they have not been signed by the proper statutory officers, and have been declared invalid on that account. They are already formal contracts, without the proper signature. Now, there remain agreements that have been made over the telephone, verbal agreements for supplies—cloth and various quartermaster supplies—and it is only a question of coming to an agreement with the contractor who has furnished these goods; and I believe I am safe in stating that three-quarters of these contracts can be settled by agreement between the contractors and the War Department.

There will remain those contracts where the contractors refuse to accept the decision of the War Department, or the examiners, or these committees, and if they refuse to accept it they can appeal to this board. But under the Hitchcock bill, as I understand, all of these contracts are thrown into this tribunal; and I venture to say that it will take five years to settle them, judging from the experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for example. That commission has nine members, and during the year ending October 31 it conducted 1,000 formal proceedings and 10,000 informal proceedings. It has an organization of approximately 700 employees, and its work involved an expenditure of $1,000,000.

Here are 6,000 contracts, at least, to be settled for $50,000. The work of the Public Service Commission of the second New York district in 1917, with 1,350 informal proceedings, cost $400,000. This commission is to have $50,000, $22,500 of which is to be expended for salaries, leaving a balance of $27,500. Can you provide the necessary clerical assistance and examiners for $27,500? It is ridiculous.

There is another point. There is to be a member from the Department of Justice and a member from the War Department. With a board constituted in that way, you will have the War Department appealing to a board to act as a judge, with a member of their own department acting as a judge on their own awards, and you will have the Department of Justice appealing to this board, on which sits one of the members of the appellant department. Now, the board should be differently constituted. If I were going to create this commission, I would put a banker, a lawyer, and a manufacturer on it; but it is foolish to assume that all of these 25,000 contracts can be thrown on this commission and that they can be examined and passed upon. Therefore I say that the Military Affairs Committee bill is the better measure, permitting the War Department, with its machinery and its information, to settle these contracts which it has made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why would it not relieve somewhat the delays suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] if on a finding by a tribunal, whatever it happens to be, the parties could receive a certain percentage of that finding, say, 50 or 75 per cent?

Mr. OVERMAN. Seventy-five per cent is the rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what is provided here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is what both bills provide.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do they provide that the party shall receive 75 per cent?

Mr. McKELLAR. Seventy-five per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then I do not think the question of delay cuts as much figure as it otherwise might.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator could well add that legislation is not needed at all regarding those contracts which have been legally executed. Consequently I see no reason for including them in a measure of this sort. This is designed to meet an emergency which was created by two circumstances: One, the necessity of getting immediate results due to the exigencies of the war, and which could not be obtained if the statutory formula for the execution of contracts were observed; and the other, the sudden termination of the war, leaving all these contractors in the air.

A good many of these contracts were made in France. Personally I do not believe that the statutory requirement concerning execution applies to contracts made in France, because it is a general proposition, I think, that the place where a contract is made and the place where a contract is executed, when those two conditions exist, make the lex loci, or the law of the location, applicable both to its execution and to its performance and to any legal propositions or controversies that may ensue from it. So that this emergency legislation is needed to meet that class of contracts, and that class of contracts only, which, because of their failure of proper statutory execution, require legislation. As to the others, the department can proceed under existing conditions; and as a consequence I think they should be excluded from the operations of a bill like this.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from New Jersey to put me straight upon one or two things that seem to me obscure, if he will allow me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not want the Senator to yield the floor, because I want to ask him a question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I retain the floor, then, and await the Senator's question.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has said, and I see it is very clear, that there are two classes of contracts provided for in the bill. The first relates to those contracts that have been executed or reduced to form, but not signed by the proper officer of the Government, or in the way provided by law. That is right; is it not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The second relates to those cases in which the contract has not been reduced to form at all, but orders having been given looking to the execution of the contract or something of that kind expenditures have been made on the faith of the contract yet to be reduced to form. Those are the two classes. When these contracts are validated is it the intention that the damages which arise on account of their nonperformance shall be settled according to the established rules of the law as those rules would apply between individuals in like circumstances?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand the bill it provides that where such an agreement was reduced to contract form and executed or signed on behalf of the Government, but the execution or signing was not in compliance with statutory requirements, the Secretary of War is directed to waive, on behalf of the Government, such noncompliance.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That answers the Senator's question in regard to the contracts that were not signed by the proper statutory officials. The bill provides further——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point before he gets away from it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I have been informed since this discussion arose that the validating portion of paragraph 1 as recommended by the War Department did not cover procurement orders, and I should like to ask the Senator how and why that was inserted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand, this bill was drawn—the chairman can probably answer that question better than I—at the request or instance of the War Industries Board. I do not know whether the original bill contained that language or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I shall be glad to state what happened.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The words "procurement orders" were not in the original draft of the amendment, and the reason why they were not was because the committee did not at that time know—it had no information before it—that any of these written contracts were in the form of what are called procurement orders. I think it was the Assistant Secretary of War who brought out that fact first, and then a number of the contractors appeared before the committee and testified that instead of having a formal contract, as provided in this first section, many of them had what were known as procurement orders that were in writing, but a peculiar form of contract that did not accord with what the law provided should be done, and yet it was in writing and set out the terms. Thereupon the committee included procurement orders with the other written contracts.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to pursue for a moment the inquiry I made, because this other matter really relates to another phase of the subject.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have just yielded to the Senator from Iowa, and I understand he has not finished.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have not finished.

The Senator from New Jersey has said that the first paragraph was intended only to validate certain contracts because they had not been signed by the proper officials. Suppose, then, that we validate a contract of that kind, and that the Government does not carry out the contract—that is, does not take the goods or the commodities, whatever is intended to be furnished by the contractor. There is nothing at all in this bill that relates to the settlement of that kind of a case, is there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand the bill which we are discussing, the failure of compliance on the part of the War Department will result in an appeal by the contractors to this commission.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not read the bill carefully, but I do not find anything in the bill that relates to or covers the case I have just put.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, that is to cover the foreign contracts where they are made by other countries in that way. For instance, our Army abroad made its contracts on letters of purchase and their approval, the same as the English, French, and Italians did. Now, as nearly as we can learn, the comptroller had not in mind, in the finding he made as to our contracts here, that it should apply to those abroad; but his deputy, immediately upon the promulgation of the order, made it applicable there. That throws all of these contracts, perfectly legitimate under the laws and practices there, into the scrap heap with the others.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I think the Senator from Wyoming has not the point in mind. I will instance a case as it was put to me.

A contractor of my own State enters into an agreement with the Government to furnish certain things.

Mr. WARREN. I was not alluding to American contracts.

Mr. CUMMINS. The contract, however, is not signed by the official whose signature is necessary in order to make it valid. This first paragraph validates a contract of that sort.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, it being validated, what becomes of it when the Government refuses to carry it out? Is there anything here that will enable that contractor to apply to the commission, or take an appeal, or in any way secure a settlement, save as the War Department in its regular organization may see fit to settle with him? That is the point that is bothering me about the first paragraph.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reading the section which creates the commission, I fail to find therein any provision for an appeal. Possibly the Senator from Tennessee can answer that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, surely. If the Senator will look on page 7, he will see that if the War Department and the contractor do not agree, or if the contractor does not feel that the War Department has treated him fairly in the matter of giving him as much as he is entitled to, he has the right to appeal. That is shown on line 11, page 7, of the bill:

> That within 30 days of the date when the Secretary of War tenders any contract or compensation as provided in this act—

That is, validates the one, or fixes the other—> or refuses to tender such contract or compensation, the party to whom said contract or compensation is tendered or refused, or the Government by a duly authorized officer from the Department of Justice, may file with the chairman of the commission a notice of appeal.

Then that committee hear it de novo as a court of appeal from the ruling of the War Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. But my difficulty is in finding in that language any reference to the first paragraph of this bill. I do not believe it covers, in its present terms, a contract that is validated simply because unsigned by the proper official.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will read all of section 2 he will find that it applies to section 1, and that follows as a necessary consequence. There is not the slightest trouble about it—not the slightest.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the floor, as a matter of fact, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the provision with reference to appeals that he is now quoting relates only to cases where the Secretary is authorized by this bill to make compensation, and this bill does not authorize the Secretary to make compensation upon a valid contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it does not. That was not what the Senator from Iowa was speaking of, however.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; that is just what I was speaking of. At the beginning of line 11 the bill provides——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just look at line 12.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to read it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will find that it is absolutely plain.

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

> That within 30 days of the date when the Secretary of War tenders any contract or compensation as provided in this act, or refuses to tender such contract or compensation—

Those are the cases in which appeals could be made to the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, under the validated contract of paragraph 1, the Secretary of War does not tender any contract nor does he tender any compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; the point is this, if the Senator will permit me: Here is a contract that is all right except that it is signed by the wrong officer, we will say. It is all written out and the contractor has one copy and the Secretary of War has the other. The Secretary validates that contract and tenders it to the contractor, and it comes directly within that language.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; there is not anything to indicate that he tenders it to the contractor.

Mr. McKELLAR. There will be a great many things done that are not specifically provided.

Mr. CUMMINS. Paragraph 2 of the bill very distinctly provides for the tender of a contract and for the tender of compensation; but I am afraid that the committee—of course, unintentionally—has excluded entirely the settlement of those cases which are simply under validated contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I do not think so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think possibly the Senator from Iowa might suggest an amendment to carry out his idea.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is easy enough. It would not be hard to suggest an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will suggest one, I am sure we shall be delighted to have it inserted to make it clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee another question, or the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. CUMMINS. In lines 16 and 17, on page 4, it is said, speaking of the validation of contracts:

Provided, That he finds such waiver is not inconsistent with the public interest.

It seems to me that if the Government has made a contract with an officer, and all that it lacks is the statutory authority of that officer to enter into the contract or to sign the contract, it is hardly fair to give the Secretary of War the privilege of saying that the Government shall not be bound by that contract if he finds that it is not consistent with the public interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is not any intention of that. It refers to an entirely different situation.

If the Senator has finished, I should like to discuss another phase of this question for just a moment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator begins——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator from New Jersey yields the floor, I should like to ask him a question on another branch of the bill.

As I read this bill, it legalizes a claim against the Government on the part of one who has performed services or expended money upon the request merely of one who is not authorized in any way to make a contract, but one who has been requested to aid the War Department in the procurement of munitions. In other words, a dollar-a-year man in the War Industries Board has requested some one to do something, under the belief that he will later get a contract, and this bill will give that man a legal claim against the Government. Am I correct?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that that is the proposition I want to discuss for just a moment when the Senator yields; and I shall be very glad to answer the Senator's question when I come to discuss it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I wanted to ask was this: Many of these contracts, two-third of them, are subcontracts. A man gets a contract to furnish a million pairs of shoes. He can not furnish them, so he lets it out to a subcontractor. I want to know if there is any provision in this bill to take care of the interests of those subcontractors?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. They are not contractors with the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is a man, now, who has a contract with the Government for $2,000,000 worth of shoes. You recognize him and settle with him; but the man who made the shoes, who furnished the shoes, you do not take care of at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think there ought to be some provision by which this whole matter shall be considered, and the man who has absolutely furnished the material shall have his money?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think, if the Senator will vote for the Hitchcock substitute, he will find that that will be taken care of.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator explain that and point out where it is. I think the bill reads much better, on the point the Senator from North Carolina refers to, than the Hitchcock amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. If Senators will give me their attention for just a few minutes I want to discuss the class of cases to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] so properly referred just a few minutes ago.

We all know that in the very active campaign we have had here during this war there have been many volunteers, men connected with certain lines of business, who have come down here and represented the Government in connection with those very lines of business; and in order to bring that matter directly to the attention of the Senate I am going to take the liberty of reading just a little of the testimony of three witnesses, one connected with the dye industry of the country, one with the clothing industry of the country, and a third with the vehicle industry of the country. I want to explain, before I read this testimony, that it shows the vital necessity of having some independent commission to pass upon the question of contracts with the Government.

I want to call attention to the fact that under the bill as reported by the House many of the officers who are going to settle these contracts for the Government will simply settle with themselves, and the Government has to pay whatever these gentlemen feel like taking. Let us suppose, for a minute, that it is contract on dyes. I produce the testimony of Mr. Rice, taken before our committee:

Senator McKELLAR. Who is the Southbridge Printing Co.?
Mr. RICE. A concern at Southbridge, Mass. They have been in sulphur dyeing for the last two years or more.
Senator McKELLAR. Who owns it?
Mr. RICE. Mr. Schuster, Mr. Heyward, Mr. Saunders—James A. Saunders—R. A. Rice, and Mr. Myrick. Mr. Hartley had some stock in there.

One of these gentlemen is the brother, the other the partner, of the witness, who is in charge of the Government dye bureau here in the city of Washington, buying millions of dollars worth of dye work, taking millions of dollars worth of dye work for the Government. Now, listen to this:

Senator McKELLAR. Who is Mr. R. A. Rice?
Mr. RICE. He is a brother of mine.
Senator McKELLAR. He is still interested in it?
Mr. RICE. Yes; he is still interested in it.
Senator McKELLAR. What amount of stock does he own?
Mr. RICE. It is my recollection, something like 75 shares. I would not state exactly. Of course that is of record.
Senator McKELLAR. What interest did you have in the business before you came down here?
Mr. RICE. I had about a little over one-quarter of the stock.

This was a dollar-a-year man who is testifying now, and this is one of the men who will settle with the dye interests if you pass the House bill and have no independent commission.

Senator McKELLAR. How much is it capitalized at?
Mr. RICE. $135,000.
Senator McKELLAR. How much, in contracts, has that concern got?
Mr. RICE. I believe about, all told, during the year—of course, I can give you an exact account of it.
Senator McKELLAR. I would be glad to have it.
Mr. RICE. About 3,000,000 yards.
Senator McKELLAR. Three million yards?
Mr. RICE. The recent contract, the gas-defense contract, they are doing some of the paraffining for the gas defense.
Senator McKELLAR. What did you do with your stock? To whom did you sell it?

He testified that he sold the stock.

Mr. RICE. To my wife. The Quartermaster's Department stated that should be done, and I transferred it to my wife.
Senator McKELLAR. You did not sell it to her, did you?
Mr. RICE. I just transferred it over for $2.
Senator McKELLAR. You just put it in her name so you would not be interested in it?
Mr. RICE. Yes; I transferred it over to her. In other words, it belongs to her.
Senator McKELLAR. Is there any other company you are connected with which you transferred to your wife the stock in?
Mr. RICE. Yes; I had some stock of the Fiskdale Finishing Co.
Senator McKELLAR. What is the capital of that company?
Mr. RICE. The capital is $200,000 preferred and $300,000 common.
Senator McKELLAR. And what was your interest in that?
Mr. RICE. My recollection is that it was a little over a quarter interest.
Senator McKELLAR. And you transferred that to your wife?
Mr. RICE. That was in the common stock of that company; and I had, I think, about $15,000, if I recall, of preferred stock. I turned that over to my wife.
Senator McKELLAR. Have you done any business with that company?
Mr. RICE. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. How much have you allotted to them?
Mr. RICE. I should say about 3,000,000 yards during the year.
Senator McKELLAR. Have those contracts been filled?
Mr. RICE. Not all of them. They are working on them now. In fact, some of the material has been delivered to them. Gray mills are behind on the gray contracts.
Senator McKELLAR. Are there any other companies with which you were connected?
Mr. RICE. No, sir; those are the only two companies I had owned any stock in.
Senator McKELLAR. Your partnership was with Mr. Myrick?
Mr. RICE. Mr. Myrick.
Senator McKELLAR. What contract have you with Mr. Myrick about your firm business while you are down here?

Mr. RICE. None whatever. I sold out to Mr. Myrick. I have resigned and am no longer a member of the firm of Myrick & Rice. I am out of it entirely.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who are the owners of that firm?

Mr. RICE. Mr. Myrick is the sole owner now of the firm.

Senator MCKELLAR. Would you object to stating upon what terms you sold out that business?

Mr. RICE. Certainly; I will be glad to state. I sold out of the firm for $5,000, and all the interest that I had there for $15,000, the total amounting to $20,000. The $15,000, of course, was to pay for back contracts on commercial business; nothing whatever on any Government business.

Senator MCKELLAR. When were these transactions; last March, before you came down here?

Mr. RICE. Last March; yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. At whose instance did you come?

The plot still thickens!

Mr. RICE. At the request of Mr. Albert Scott and Mr. Miller Wilson.

Senator MCKELLAR. What has become of Mr. Scott? What is he doing now?

Mr. RICE. I could not say. He is in Boston. I could not tell you just what he is doing.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Scott was interested in nearly all these mills, was he not?

Mr. RICE. I could not say.

Senator MCKELLAR. You did not know that he had had large interests in them?

Mr. RICE. No, sir; I did not know anything about it. In fact, I had never met Mr. Scott but once, in 1917.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Scott, I do not believe, had any interest in any of these competing plants, but he had interests in all the cotton manufactories, or was represented in them.

Mr. DONALD. Only a very few, Senator.

I am not going to read all this testimony, but what he testified was that he was down here representing the Government, buying from the mills in which he formerly owned the stock and which he transferred to his wife without compensation, and that they were getting the dividends from that stock, and it was paying very handsomely, too. If when we turn these contracts over to the Secretary of War, as provided by the House, we are going to turn the settlement of the contract over to Mr. Rice, who may still be a dollar-a-year man, as I understand, or was a short time ago; is that right? Does any Senator feel that he wants to do that? Why pass any bill at all? Why not just invite the contractors and these dollar-a-year men to come down and take what they want?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be delighted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, no one will indorse such a practice as the Senator has pointed out in reading the testimony, but can not the interests of the Government be safeguarded against such fraud, if fraud it is?

Mr. McKELLAR. It can not be under the bill introduced in the House. I believe it can be safeguarded under the Hitchcock bill, with section 3 of the substitute bill as an amendment. I hope it can. I do not know whether that will do it or not. It is mighty hard to get around these gentlemen.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator that on page 4 of the committee amendment the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] suggested that it would improve the bill and protect the Government against such a practice the Senator has pointed out in the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs by striking out, on line 6, page 4, the words "to produce or aid in procuring the same for the War Department."

Mr. McKELLAR. That would help it some, but it is perfectly evident to me that if this were a solitary example that I was referring to here there might not be a great deal in the contention. However, this is the rule and not the exception. I do not say it is a universal rule, but the rule very largely. For instance, in the Clothing and Equipage Division I have the testimony here of Mr. H. L. Bailey, the chairman of that division. He testified that he had stock in a number of concerns, and he transferred it to his wife and then did business with his wife's concern and the concern of Wellington, Sears & Co., and expected to go back as soon as the war is over. I am not going to read that testimony, but I ask unanimous consent to put it in the RECORD. I think Senators ought to have it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE CASE OF H. L. BAILEY.

The case of H. L. Bailey, who is chief of the cotton-goods branch of the Clothing and Equipage Division, is somewhat similar to that of Mr. Rice. Mr. Bailey was a partner of the Wellington, Sears & Co., one of the largest cotton-goods firms of the country. He also owned stock in one cotton mill, and his wife had stock in two cotton mills. He had stock in the Gluck Mills, of Anderson, S. C., and his wife owned stock in the Lanett Cotton Mills, Lanett, Ala., and the Equinox Mills, of Anderson, S. C. He bought from both the Lanett and Equinox Mills.

Senator MCKELLAR. Now, virtually speaking, this compensation is, with the exception of Commander Hancock, fixed by the trade? In other words, you gentlemen are all affiliated with the cotton trade?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know what you mean by "affiliated."

Senator MCKELLAR. I mean connected.

Mr. BAILEY. I am an experienced cotton manufacturer and have come from the industry.

Senator MCKELLAR. You are not connected with it at the present time, but you came from the firm of Wellington, Sears & Co. and were what is known as a dollar-a-year man?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. And you went out of Wellington, Sears & Co. after you went into the service of the Government as a dollar-a-year man?

Mr. BAILEY. I did.

Senator MCKELLAR. And there is no use our attempting to camouflage the thing one way or another. We might as well look it right square in the face. When this war is over you are going back in the cotton trade, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. I am, as I have to support my family.

Senator MCKELLAR. Of course; and your interests and expectations are all in that trade; and it does seem to me that we could devise a plan that would make a real buyer and seller. As it is now, you gentlemen just fix the amount at such figure as you think would be reasonable, upon such basis as you think fit, and the Government foots the bill; and I see here from the public print that there never has been such marvelous prosperity to the cotton mills of the country. That is natural and, in a way, that is admirably right.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. But I do not think that they ought to take such tremendous profits; and they are taking enormous profits. Now, Mr. Scott testified frankly that there were from 8 to 10 turnovers a year, and that they allowed on the basis of 12½ per cent on a turnover. By an easy calculation, that is from 100 to 150 per cent a year.

Mr. BAILEY. Did Mr. Scott testify that there were from 8 to 10 turnovers a year?

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes; that is my recollection.

Mr. BAILEY. Either you or Mr. Scott are mistaken.

Senator MCKELLAR. How many turnovers are there a year?

Mr. BAILEY. It varies with the different kinds of goods.

Senator MCKELLAR. Just enumerate the different kinds of goods, if you will, because I do not want to have any mistake about it. I do not want to be mistaken about it. Take the white duck used for tentage, and how many turnovers are there a year on that?

Mr. BAILEY. I will have to make a little computation here on that.

Senator MCKELLAR. As a matter of fact, Mr. Bailey, the real committee that fixes prices is the small committee composed of Mr. Scott, yourself, and Commander Hancock and Mr. Turner?

Mr. BAILEY. Absolutely not, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. In what instance has any fixing of prices ever been changed by the big committee?

Mr. BAILEY. The low basis of prices which was submitted by this war-service committee before I became a member of the smaller committee, and which was put up to the large committee by the smaller committee was—well, I will not say repudiated, because it is too strong a word; but it was not allowed by the large committee, and the industry was called in conference by the large committee and the matters were thrashed out and the basis arranged in conference with the large committee and not by the small committee.

Senator MCKELLAR. Was that one approved by the small committee—that one that was adopted?

Mr. BAILEY. I was not a member of the small committee at the time. It was approved to the extent that it was put up to the large committee.

Senator MCKELLAR. What I want to know is, has any recommendation of the small committee, since you have been a member of it, ever been turned down by the big committee?

Mr. BAILEY. The small committee since I have been a member of it has not taken the responsibility for these prices. It has merely discussed the details, and a group of experts appointed by the price-fixing committee of the War Industries Board has been intrusted with the responsibility of supervising the differentials made for different cotton fabrics.

Senator MCKELLAR. Now, what committee is that?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not taken any responsibility for the price fixing.

Senator MCKELLAR. What is this supervising committee? Whom is that composed of?

Mr. BAILEY. It is composed of two mill engineers, Mr. Makepeace and Mr. Sirrine.

Senator MCKELLAR. Anybody else?

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who is Mr. Makepeace, and what mill is he connected with?

Mr. BAILEY. He is not connected with any mill. He is an engineer of Providence, R. I.

Senator MCKELLAR. An engineer. Whom does he work for? What is his first name?

Mr. BAILEY. He has his own concern. I can not recall his first name, for the moment.

Senator MCKELLAR. What kind of an engineer is he? What does he know about making prices for cotton goods?

Mr. BAILEY. He is a construction engineer.

Senator MCKELLAR. What does he know about making prices for cotton goods?

Mr. BAILEY. I should think that would be a proper question for him to answer, Senator McKellar.

Senator MCKELLAR. I know, but I just want to find out something about him.

Mr. BAILEY. He is a man who lays out mills for making certain grades of fabrics, who is presumably well informed as to the present cost of such mills, as to the past cost of such mills, their productive capacity, and for that reason the profit per pound which they should have to give them a certain return on their capital invested, and that sort of thing.

Senator MCKELLAR. Is he employed by cotton mills—to construct cotton mills?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. Is he in them, personally?

Mr. BAILEY. Very likely, but I do not know. I have no knowledge of it.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who is Mr. Sirrine?

Mr. BAILEY. He is also a mill engineer, of Greenville, S. C.

Senator MCKELLAR. Does he own mills, too?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know.

Senator MCKELLAR. Or is he interested in their ownership?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know. My description of Mr. Makepeace would apply to Mr. Sirrine also.

Senator MCKELLAR. Is it not a fact that with the exception of the Army and Navy officers, every man connected with the price fixing is directly or indirectly connected with the cotton trade?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. Now, name any that are not.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Brookings, Mr. Baruch, Prof. Taussig, and Mr. Franey.

Senator MCKELLAR. Was Mr. Brookings ever connected with it?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. What was his business?

Mr. BAILEY. He was the president of the Samuel Couples Woodenware Co., of St. Louis.

Senator MCKELLAR. Prof. Taussig never was connected with the cotton trade?

Mr. BAILEY. Not to my knowledge. He was a professor at Harvard College.

Senator MCKELLAR. I know he was. I did not know what his business was prior to that. Do you know whether Mr. Baruch or Prof. Taussig or Mr. Brookings have ever gone themselves into the figures submitted by these various committees?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Brookings has himself in great detail, and so has Mr. Baruch. Mr. Baruch was present and spoke at length at one meeting of the price-fixing committee.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have they ever taken into consideration the profits made by these concerns?

Mr. BAILEY. The profits that have been made?

Senator MCKELLAR. That are being made out of the Government by these various selling concerns.

Mr. BAILEY. I think so.

Senator MCKELLAR. If you have taken that into consideration, what profits have been made by any of the mills, and give their profits that you considered.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not qualified to do that, Senator McKellar.

Senator MCKELLAR. And give the dates.

Mr. BAILEY. I haven't them.

Senator MCKELLAR. Did you ever consider it in making these prices?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. For instance, we have been allocating heavy duck from about 40 mills. Now, some of those mills would make double the profit of others, at the same price. But I want to record with you that the large profits made by the cotton mills, the marvelous profits that you have spoken of, have not been made on Government contracts, but because they have been selling their commercial contracts at much higher prices than the Government has been paying, and that all of that excess was an additional profit; and further, that these mills have, within the last year and a half, gone from cotton below 20 cents a pound to cotton at 36 or 37 cents a pound, which in itself would mean an enormous profit on their raw material. They have got the other end of that coming

Senator MCKELLAR. Does the price change from time to time?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh yes—not since price fixing.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did you have the first price fixing?

Mr. BAILEY. The first price fixing was made the latter part of June, to be effective from June 8, I believe.

Senator MCKELLAR. And then you paid the same prices for all cotton goods bought—I mean of the same grade and quality?

Mr. BAILEY. Since that time.

Senator MCKELLAR. Since that time?

Mr. BAILEY. From normal producers.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you a statement from the mills in which you and Mrs. Bailey are interested as to the profits made for last year and this year?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have no idea what they are. I have been very busy with other things.

Senator MCKELLAR. You do not know what dividends they pay?

Mr. BAILEY. I haven't it in mind, you know.

Senator MCKELLAR. Do you know what dividends any of these mills pay that you have been doing business with? Have you it in mind?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have not.

Senator MCKELLAR. You fixing prices this way, would not that be very important knowledge for you to have?

Mr. BAILEY. I think——

Senator MCKELLAR. Is not that the most important knowledge that you could have if you were going to fix the price? For instance, if you were going to fix the price for lumber produced by me—I am not in the lumber business, but used to be many years ago—suppose you were going to fix the price of lumber and I was a going concern and had a large business, and we were selling to you and had been selling to you on Government contracts——

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. Would it not be very important for you to know what profits I was making on that lumber before you undertook to fix the price?

Mr. BAILEY. If you were a corporation and were selling the Government at a lower price than you were selling your civilian business, I should say that the profits you were making were no indication of what a fair price would be on your lumber.

Senator MCKELLAR. Taking it about selling the Government at a lower price, the fact that the Government is in the market for these cotton goods is one of the things that has made cotton goods soar?

Mr. BAILEY. Definitely; yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. But that is not my problem, you know.

Senator MCKELLAR. But your problem is when you fix the price that you give the seller a reasonable profit, is it not?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. How can you tell what a reasonable price is unless you know what his profit is?

Mr. DONALD. Mr. Bailey testified that he is not on that price-fixing committee.

Senator MCKELLAR. I know, but he has recommended to them.

Mr. DONALD. He has never recommended to them.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you never recommended to them?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not, officially.

Senator MCKELLAR. That is just the thing. I can understand how a price might not be recommended officially and yet just as effectively. As you will recall, one of the things I have been decrying for over a year is these unofficial committees actually doing the work, and I have a letter from the Secretary of War assuring me that there was not an unofficial committee in operation, yet I find them at almost every turn of the road where unofficial committees are recommending prices.

Mr. BAILEY. You mistake the intention of my remark.

Senator MCKELLAR. Well, of course I do not want to do that.

Mr. BAILEY. As one of probably 25 in a meeting with the War Industries Board price-fixing committee I have participated in a discussion regarding prices. My influence has not been on the side of increasing prices of cotton goods, Senator MCKELLAR.

Senator MCKELLAR. Well, now, do you actually, whether officially or unofficially, recommend prices?

Mr. BAILEY. At the present time?

Senator MCKELLAR. At the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I do not.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you ever done it?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did you stop?

Mr. BAILEY. When——

Senator MCKELLAR. The price was fixed?

Mr. BAILEY. When price fixing came into effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether he said it will be a case of these gentlemen passing upon their own irregular contracts?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. FLETCHER. For instance, the Secretary of War or the Assistant Secretary of War has stated that they have an original board going into this question, and then they have contract review boards.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I understand all that, but it is the man who represents the Government in the initial proceeding who commits the Government and the review board really adopts what he does.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the question. The review boards are not there for that purpose.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will say this to the Senator and let him think it over himself. I earnestly asked the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General of the Army, upon the proof I have read just awhile ago from Mr. Rice, that they would discharge Mr. Rice and get somebody who was disconnected with that industry in charge of that particular division, and they declined to do it. Mr. Rice, so far as I know, still represents the Government, although this testimony was taken several weeks ago. If that is the case, what we are doing, if we vote for the House bill or if we vote for the initial arrangement, is just to turn it over to these very gentlemen to settle their own contracts. That is all we are doing, and we might just as well invite these gentlemen to come down and take what they will, but I want Senators to do it with their eyes wide open, because those are the facts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me remind the Senator that we are not voting on the House bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I know, but if you leave it to these gentlemen who are representing the department now to settle with themselves as provided under the committee bill, you are simply turning it over to them to settle on their own good judgment, and you see what kind of men you are going to settle with.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is going rather far in that conclusion.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator read the testimony? It will be in the RECORD in the morning, and he can reach his own conclusion.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not questioning that, but what I am interested in is that his review board has something more to do than to rubber stamp the action of some subordinate officer.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Let me interrupt the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to complete the sentence. The review board as now constituted is already operating and it is composed of Mr. Garnett, of Virginia; Mr. Lehmann, of New York; and Mr. Malone, of New York. They are actually functioning now as a board. So you can not say that they would be selected after this bill is passed with any view to passing favorably on contracts or anything of that sort.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The trouble about it is that the commission established under the bill last reported out by the committee has not any jurisdiction until it is appealed to, and 95 per cent of the cases will not be appealed by either party, and you will leave it to these very men, who have been dealing with the Government in that way, to pass upon their own acts. If the Senate is willing to do that, it may do so. I am not going to vote that way myself.

I next come to the testimony of Mr. Donald, and I want to call the attention of Senators particularly to the fact that the reason for accepting dollar-a-year men was that they had peculiar knowledge of the things about which they came here to do work.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Donald, will you tell us your connection with the Quartermaster Corps?

Mr. DONALD. I am chief of the clothing and equipage division.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did you become chief of that division?

Mr. DONALD. About June 1.

Senator MCKELLAR. What was your business before?

Clothing man? Equipage man? No.

Mr. DONALD. I was a lawyer.
Senator MCKELLAR. Were you ever engaged in the cotton business?
Mr. DONALD. No, sir.
Senator MCKELLAR. How did you happen to get into the cotton goods department of the Government?
Mr. DONALD. Well, it is the whole clothing and equipage division.
Senator MCKELLAR. Well, the whole clothing and equipage division; how did you happen to get into it?
Mr. DONALD. I was asked to come to Washington last February.
Senator MCKELLAR. By whom?
Mr. DONALD. Mr. Scott, who was then chief of the division.

I will say to the Senator that Mr. Scott was the man who was discharged at my request, and for which I have been considerably criticized. He was discharged as chief of this division because of his connection with practically all the firms with which he was doing business. That appeared in the proof, and the quartermaster acted upon my request and discharged Mr. Scott. Here is Mr. Donald, a man who comes and takes Mr. Scott's place, and it develops afterwards that he is Mr. Scott's lawyer or the lawyer for Scott's firm. Now, listen to this:

I was asked to come to Washington last February.

Senators, remember now we are turning the settlement of these contracts over to these gentlemen to settle with themselves. I sometimes think the poor old Government has not many friends around.

Mr. SMOOT. Where did Mr. Scott go?

Mr. MCKELLAR. He went back home; but I will give it to you from the testimony in a moment.

Senator MCKELLAR. Did you ever represent Mr. Scott or any of his companies before that?
Mr. DONALD. I personally have not represented Mr. Scott. My firm had done some business for Mr. Scott.
Senator MCKELLAR. What is your firm?
Mr. DONALD. Herrick, Smith, Donald & Farley.
Senator MCKELLAR. What Herrick is that?
Mr. DONALD. Robert F. Herrick.
Senator MCKELLAR. Of New York?
Mr. DONALD. Of Boston.
Senator MCKELLAR. You were asked by Mr. Scott to come here?
Mr. DONALD. Yes, sir.
Senator MCKELLAR. Were you familiar with the cotton trade, the clothing trade, before you came here?
Mr. DONALD. No, sir.
Senator MCKELLAR. Were you ever in the clothing business or the cotton business?
Mr. DONALD. No, sir.
Senator MCKELLAR. You heard Mr. Bailey testify a few minutes ago that it would be difficult to find a man who had never had any experience in the business that would know enough about it to manage it for the Government. How do you get along under that definition?
Mr. DONALD. Our division is a very large division, and, of course, we have in each of our branches the men who are technical experts in the business.
Senator MCKELLAR. Why were you selected? Do you have any idea why you were selected to come down here?
Mr. BAILEY. He is too modest to answer.

He was too modest to answer; he did not answer, and Mr. Bailey testified for him.

Senator MCKELLAR. Let him go right ahead. I am after the facts.
Mr. DONALD. The clothing and equipage division was organized by Gen. Goethals in January or this year. It was an entirely new organization and they needed a large number of men to assist. I myself have recently been endeavoring to get another lawyer to come down here. I came down as general assistant, believing there would be work in which I could assist.
Senator MCKELLAR. Referring again to your connection with cotton firms, does Herrick, Smith, Donald & Farley represent cotton manufacturers?
Mr. DONALD. There are a good many cotton manufacturers in and around Boston and New England.

That is supposed to be an answer to the question.

Senator MCKELLAR. Just tell me offhand; I will not hold you to all of your clients in that particular line, but give me the more important ones, at any rate.
Mr. DONALD. We have, so far as I know, Senator, no retainers from any firms.
Senator MCKELLAR. I understand that, but I want to know whom you represented. For instance, I know whether I represented the Union State Bank or the Central State Bank of Memphis, Tenn., and if you asked me what firms I represented I could give them to you that quick, or if you asked me what cotton houses I had represented I can tell you.
Mr. DONALD. My firm had four members, and it is a firm which has been in practice since 1873, and it has represented a great many different concerns at different times.
Senator MCKELLAR. Would you give me what your firm represented, so far as you can? You have been in the firm over a year?
Mr. DONALD. Yes, sir.
Senator MCKELLAR. And you have been in it since the war? You are interested in it now?
Mr. DONALD. Not at the present time.

Listen to this:

Senator MCKELLAR. You have no interest in the partnership now?

Here is what he said, and I will afterwards read you what he interlined:

Mr. DONALD. Last year the firm of Herrick, Smith, Donald & Farley was formed. We were formerly members of the firm of Fish, Richardson, Herrick & Neave. Mr. Farley, one of my partners, went to Plattsburgh in April. My partner, Mr. Smith, had been in the Army and he is now abroad. The firm has practically been broken up. I do not understand that I am getting any money from the firm and I have not been since last February.

He interlines this:

I do not understand that I am getting any money from (earned by other members of) the firm and I have not been (received any) since last February. (I stated to them when I left that I did not wish to take any amounts thereafter earned by the other partners, and that I wished to share expenses if the salaried employees did not earn their expenses. If these employees earn more than their expenses, it is possible the partners may wish to apportion a share of this surplus to me, but the matter has never been arranged or seriously considered.)

I am not going to read all he said, but it is on a line with the other. Here are other firms that he represents, every one of them doing business with his division of the Government, and when you turn these contracts over to him to arrange you are going to just turn them right over to the contractors to settle. When you take either one of the first bills without an independent commission are you going to turn it over to these gentlemen to settle with themselves and with their clients?

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will yield in just one minute.

I asked him for the names and he said he had represented mills and cotton agents, the Queen City Cotton Mills and various others. He goes on to testify that he took Mr. Scott's place. I ask permission to insert in the RECORD that testimony verbatim. It is not very long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. MALCOLM DONALD, CHIEF OF THE CLOTHING AND EQUIPAGE DIVISION, QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Donald, will you tell us your connection with the Quartermaster Corps?
Mr. DONALD. I am chief of the clothing and equipage division.
Senator MCKELLAR. When did you become chief of that division?

Senator MCKELLAR. It has been dissolved?

Mr. DONALD. It has not been formally dissolved.

Senator MCKELLAR. And there has been no modification of the agreement about profits of the firm?

Mr. DONALD. We had no writtten agreement.

Senator MCKELLAR. You had no agreement?

Mr. DONALD. (No written agreement.) When I came away it was understood that I should take no further profits (did not wish to take profits thereafter earned by other members of the firm.)

Senator MCKELLAR. I interrupted you when you were going to give me a list of the cotton manufacturers that you represented.

Mr. DONALD. We have represented the Pacific Mills and the Everett Mills.

Senator MCKELLAR. The Everett?

Mr. DONALD. At times. We have represented the Harmony Mills; Bliss, Fabyan & Co., and, I think, at times, Minot, Hooper & Co.

Senator MCKELLAR. Did you ever represent any companies in which Mr. A. L. Scott was interested?

Mr. DONALD. The firm has.

Senator MCKELLAR. Which ones are those? Do you know what concerns Mr. Scott is interested in? Mr. Scott is in all of them, is he not, directly or indirectly?

Mr. DONALD. He is in two or three—three or four.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Scott is a partner of Lockwood, Green & Co.

Mr. DONALD. J. Spencer Turner & Co. I personally did not do their work, and that is the reason, Senator, I can not tell you.

Mr. BAILEY. J. Spencer Turner & Co.?

Senator MCKELLAR. What is that Green firm?

Mr. BAILEY. Lockwood, Green & Co.; that is the Mount Vernon-Woodbury Mills.

Mr. DONALD. It is the International Cotton Mills.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; the International Cotton Mills.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Scott is at the head of the J. Spencer Turner Co.?

Mr. DONALD. No, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. What company is he the head of?

Mr. DONALD. He is not the head of any firm. He is a member of the firm of Lockwood, Green & Co., who are mill engineers, really, and who are managers of several concerns.

Mr. BAILEY. And part owners in these concerns that we have mentioned here.

Senator MCKELLAR. You do not recall any others?

Mr. DONALD. I think our firm has doubtless represented other firms of a similar kind.

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes. As a matter of fact, your firm is a large firm and represents a great many of these mills and cotton agents, does it not?

Mr. DONALD. It has, from time to time.

Senator MCKELLAR. It has, from time to time?

Mr. DONALD. I believe I did a small amount of work for the Queen City Cotton Mills last year.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have all these concerns got contracts with the Government?

Mr. DONALD. I have not the slightest iden, Senator.

Senator MCKELLAR. Do you know whether any of them have?

Mr. DONALD. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BAILEY. They all have, unless we have overlooked them.

Senator MCKELLAR. Unless you have overlooked them. Now, why did Mr. Scott want you, a lawyer, to come down here and engage in the cotton goods business?

Mr. DONALD. He asked me to come down and take up the question of the inspection of our goods.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did he ask you to come down?

Mr. DONALD. In January, I think.

Senator MCKELLAR. You came, when?

Mr. DONALD. I came in February, as I recall it.

Senator MCKELLAR. You came as a dollar-a-year man?

Mr. DONALD. No; I have been paid a salary of $3,500.

* * * * * *

Senator MCKELLAR. Whose place did you take?

Mr. DONALD. Mr. Scott's place.

Senator MCKELLAR. You took Mr. Scott's place? You knew that Mr. Scott's resignation had been asked for because of his connection with the various concerns which he had been in business with, did you not?

Mr. DONALD. I understood that was one reason.

Senator MCKELLAR. As a lawyer did you not feel that your coming into the same place, representing all these companies, or in part representing all these companies, would put you in virtually the same position that Mr. Scott had been in before?

Mr. DONALD. I do not understand that I am representing all these companies.

Senator MCKELLAR. You have just testified here to representing a great number of mills, and being the legal representative of Mr. Scott himself, or one of his mills, and you say you came here at his request, and you have taken his place, and my question is that, when you have seen that Mr. Scott was asked for his resignation because of his connection with these various mills with which you say you are connected, would it not have seemed to you—I am just asking this very plainly and very bluntly—that it would put you in the same category as it would Mr. Scott? In other words, if a vice president of Mr. Scott's company, or a man interested just precisely like Mr. Scott was, had come to you and asked you for legal advice, saying that Mr. Scott had just been dismissed from the Government service because he was connected with all these cotton firms, and asked you if you would advise him to take Mr. Scott's place, under those circumstances you would not have hesitated a moment in saying that this other man who was similarly situated would fall under the same ban, would you?

Mr. DONALD. I would undertake to ask him what his connection was. The fact that some cotton mills have in the past employed me to do some legal services for them did not, to my mind, mean that I was at present interested in those cotton mills.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who gave Mr. Scott the right to appoint you in his stead?

Mr. DONALD. Mr. Scott did not appoint me in his stead.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who appointed you in his place?

Mr. DONALD. Gen. Wood, Acting Quartermaster General.

Senator MCKELLAR. All right. Unless you wish to make some other statement I do not believe that there is anything further. I am greatly obliged to both of you.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NUGENT. I merely desired to ask the Senator from Tennessee which one of these numerous bills he feels will obviate the objections which he has raised.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Hitchcock bill, with the amendment of section 3 of the committee's bill, will come nearer doing it than any other, and that is what I propose. I suppose the Senate will perfect both that and the Hitchcock bill. I mean under the rule or under unanimous consent the Hitchcock bill will be perfected and then the committee bill will be perfected. When it comes to the perfection of the Hitchcock bill I wish to offer section 3 of the committee's bill as an amendment to that bill, and with that amendment I am going to vote for the Hitchcock bill, because I think it will come nearer obviating the difficulties I have mentioned.

I want to say that the same objection arises not only in the equipage division and the clothing division but in the dyestuffs division, but it does arise especially in the vehicle division. The testimony shows what has been done in the vehicle division and what has been done in the enamel-ware division, where one concern cut out all the rest of them, and its agent, who was a Maj. McCubbin in the Army, bought all except $34,000 worth of enamel ware from one concern over in Pittsburgh. Under those circumstances you are just turning over to this great enamel-ware concern the right to settle with its own employees representing the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator? Does the Senator mean to say that any of those representatives are on any of these boards?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I mean to say, for instance, Col. R. W. Lea, as shown by the proof before our subcommittee, is the chief of the vehicle division. He is connected with either the Moline or Studebaker Co., I forget which—the proof will show—and has sent out instructions which I am going to ask leave to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, a letter, by which it appears to me that he instructed the vehicle division how they could best get the most out of their unfinished contract with the Government. I have it not before me, but I will get it and submit it, and ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 5, 1918.

MOTORS AND VEHICLES DIVISION,
VEHICLES BRANCH, O. B. P. & S.,
Munitions Building, Washington, D. C.

Cancellation of Escort Wheel Contract, P. O. No. ———.

1. It has been found, in the best interest of the military service, necessary to cancel a large portion of the undelivered balance of contracts for Escort wagon wheels; and your contract, as above noted, covering Escort wheels is reduced to ——— wheels, in accordance with mutual agreement reached with you when you were in the office of the Vehicle Branch at Washington, November ———, 1918. The plan of procedure covering this cancellation of ——— Escort wheels was discussed with you, and an adjustment which will save you from loss in the transaction is to be made substantially according to the following plan:

a. No payment will be made for prospective profits on the canceled portion of your contract.

b. The Government will enter into a supplemental contract with you whereby your original contract is reduced in size by the amount above stated and whereby you will be reimbursed for the following items, upon furnishing satisfactory written statements, certified as correct and checked and approved by Government officers.

2. Those items are allowable only when the expenses are incurred by you in good faith for the performance of the contract and as fairly and properly apportionable to the Escort wheels, delivery of which is now terminated.

a. Expenses of special engineering, plant organization, and miscellaneous indirect items: This item will cover these expenses which may not now be shown as tangible assets, such a the cost of perfecting organization, general engineering expenses incurred in the designing and installation of special equipment acquired, and such other provable items which in ordinary manufacturing experience cause the earlier deliveries on a contract to be less profitable than the later deliveries, by reason of delay in obtaining good production, on account of training of organization required in equipment, increased cost of administration and supervision on account of lack of acquaintance with difficulties, etc. Some firms charge such items to "job cost," in which case certified account can be easily rendered. If such practice is not employed by you, it is very necessary that you scrutinize this item carefully, so that the figures submitted may be supported by the facts gathered through possible later investigation.

Manufacturing experience usually shows that the last part of a contract renders a larger percentage of profit than the first portion of deliveries, large enough in most cases to make up for the smaller profit in the first period of production. As this portion of the contract rendering a more favorable profit is hereby canceled, some recognition of the spread of this indirect expense will be given; but you are cautioned, as stated above, to go into this matter in detail, as profits or losses vary according to the efficiency of concerns, and figures submitted on this item must be irrefutable.

Several contractors in our conference have stated that they would undoubtedly waive this claim, especially those who have been on quite similar wheel production prior to the taking of the contract which is now partially canceled.

The statement covering it, therefore, should be clear, convincing, and supported by actual cost records which you can fully substantiate.

b. Cost of facilities and equipment provided solely for the performance of this contract: This includes machinery and special tools and cost of installing these, dry kilns, buildings and necessary remodeling, and other equipment which falls within the proviso. Those items must be accompanied by a sworn statement covering the cost of all such facilities, item by item, and the statement must be clearly provable by you by original invoices, book entries, or other information submitted. To guide you in the handling of this matter an assumed case is explained below:

For example: Let us state that $100,000 was spent on the equipment, as covered above, to take care of the manufacture of 100,000 wheels, of which 50,000 wheels are now canceled.

From this total, fully set forth, is to be deducted an amount which can be fairly and properly considered absorbed in the completed portion of the contract. In other words, as you build wheels you gradually absorb the cost of special facilities.

In the assumed case, 50,000 wheels will be built out of the 100,000 wheels for which equipment and facilities were provided. One half the original cost is therefore absorbed, and the difference is $50,000.

From this amount (difference between original cost and cost absorbed) is to be deducted the appraised value of the facilities. This will be determined by three appraisers—one appointed by the contractor, one appointed by the contracting officers, and the third appointed by those two. This appraised value is ascertained by them—in other words, a salvage value depending upon the value of the facilities to you in your manufacture or their resale value to others or possibly scrap value, is to be deducted. In determining this, it is presumed that the expense of removing the facilities, if this should be necessary, will be considered.

In our assumed case, suppose the appraised value was $10,000, then the sum remaining is the net compensation due you on account of expenditures made for facilities and equipment provided solely for the performance of your contract.

In this case the difference is $40,000, and this amount will be paid to you by the Government.

In preparing the tentative statement on this Item B sub b, the appraised value will have to be left blank. When you are ready for the appraisal to be made, the appraiser selected by the contracting officers will be sent to your plant to perform this duty immediately upon notification.

C. Where you have provided in good faith items of material which will be left on hand and which are over and above the materials required in the wheels covered by the reduced contract which you will be allowed to produce, such materials will be purchased by the Government and will become the property of the United States. Such items will be covered by certified invoices and in determining unit value f. o. b. your plant there will be included an additional 10 per cent covering handling charges in and out and any other necessary compensation.

Continuing our assumed case: Say you have on hand 50,000 club turned spokes which cost you 13½ cents each at your factory. Part of these are fully finished, part kiln dried, and part green club turned. Assume that the portion of the order that you are allowed to complete consumes all of the finished and kiln-dried spokes and you have left over 16,000 green club turned spokes. You would, therefore, show this item as—16,000 escort wheel spokes, green club turned, cost f. o. b. your factory 13.5 cents each plus 10 per cent handling, 14.85 cents each—for all $2,376. You will attach to your statement certified invoices showing the purchase and delivery of such quantity at such price.

If it happens that you have material left on hand partially finished by you the labor expended thereon will be shown by proper cost sheets certified to you as correct.

D. Cost to you to cover cancellation of obligations incurred in good faith, covering materials or work provided solely in the performance of the contract. If you have outstanding obligations for materials—hubs, for instance—above those that will be required by your revised contract, you should cancel that obligation at the lowest possible cost to yourself and at no cost if that is possible.

The basis of such a cancellation should be identical to that applied by the Government to you and as explained above. While you are urged to initiate those negotiations at once, you are requested before completing same—where it is necessary to agree to pay money to a subcontractor—to submit your tentative proposition for review by Government officers so that you will not incur an expense which they may later feel not justified in allowing. It is believed that most of these cancellations can be effected at little or no cost.

3. It is advisable for you to make your statements comprehensive and self-explanatory so that they may be acted upon complete and with dispatch and avoid delays in requesting further proofs and information.

4. It is suggested and strongly urged that there be used in the balance of your production, first the most highly manufactured materials so that there will be left over, if any, only the least expensive items as surplus. This is in the interest of conservation of labor and material and will tend to greatly reduce the loss of cancellation to the Government.

5. On account of a careful analysis of the entire stock situation and discussion with manufacturers it was shown that ample materials were already on hand to balance production at all factories and it is therefore assumed that further production of all raw materials has been stopped.

6. If an advance on your contract has been secured by you from the Government, same will in no way enter into cancellation adjustment as such. Most advances will by the end of your deliveries be largely repaid by deductions from invoices according to established plan of handling same. The unpaid balance undoubtedly is represented by surplus materials which the Government will take off your hands or by facilities and equipment of which the unabsorbed cost—less salvage—will be repaid by the Government. The above assumption is made as these loans were provided by the Government for the performance of the contract they covered and not for materials used in the ordinary course of your manufacture or to retire bank loans then outstanding.

7. The cost of additional dry kilns, whether built on approved applications or not, should be included under B—Facilities and equipment provided by the contractor at his expense solely for this contract.

8. It is requested that you give this matter your immediate, careful consideration, forwarding all papers complete to the Motors and Vehicles Division, Vehicle Branch, Munitions Building, Washington, D. C., at the earliest practicable date.

By authority of the Director of Purchase.

R. W. LEA,
Colonel, Q. M. C., in charge Vehicle Branch.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., Friday, October 11, 1918.

The subcommittee met at 2 o'clock p. m., Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR presiding.

Present, Senators MCKELLAR, SUTHERLAND, and JOHNSON of California.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. JOHN C. M'CUBBIN, QUARTERMASTER CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator MCKELLAR. Will you give your full name and title to the stenographer?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. John C. McCubbin, major, Quartermaster Corps.

Senator MCKELLAR. How long have you been a major in the Quartermaster Corps?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I think it is since the 6th of September.

Senator MCKELLAR. 1917?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. 1918; this past September.

Senator MCKELLAR. When were you first commissioned at all?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. February 1, 1918.

Senator MCKELLAR. As what?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Captain.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did you come to work for the Government?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. It was August 15, 1917.

Senator MCKELLAR. In what capacity?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. As purchaser of plumbing materials.

Senator MCKELLAR. With what concern were you at the time?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. The Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co.

Senator MCKELLAR. How long had you been with that company?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Not quite three years; about, I should say, two years and eight months, I think—two years and seven or eight months.

Senator MCKELLAR. Are you interested in that company?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. No, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. How were you interested—as a salaried man?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Salaried; yes, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. What salary did you get?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Just when I came into the company?

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes.

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I was getting $3,000 a year.

Senator MCKELLAR. When did your service with the company cease?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I think my resignation took effect the 14th, the 14th or the 15th. The matter was handled so quick, I don't know just what day. I know I was at the office one day, and went to work the next, I think.

Senator MCKELLAR. Who called you to come? At whose request did you come?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Maj. Hamilton's, who was then purchasing agent of the cantonment division.

Senator MCKELLAR. How did you happen to meet Maj. Hamilton?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I was brought to Washington—my location was changed for the Standard Co., and I was brought up to Washington on account of one of the Washington men being sick here, and the other away on his vacation; and I think the cantonment division then wanted some one to succeed Capt. Maddock, who was looking after the purchasing of material, and through Capt. Maddock, Maj. Hamilton requested that they get some one to take this place, and they communicated with the Washington office of the Standard Co. while I was here, and the commanding officer carried it over to Maj. Hamilton. [Revised by Exhibit 2, p. 611 post.]

Senator MCKELLAR. Did this arrangement have the approval at that time of the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. people? [Revised by Exhibit 2, p. 611 post.]

Maj. MCCUBBIN. So far as I know, it did not.

Senator MCKELLAR. Was Mr. Ahrens down here at that time?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. At the time that I went into the service?

Senator MCKELLAR. When you went into the service.

Maj. MCCUBBIN. No, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. Has he been here?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. He was here in November, I think, the first time, and he was here in August.

Senator MCKELLAR. What was the name of the first gentleman you mentioned?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Capt. A. M. Maddock.

Senator MCKELLAR. What position did he hold with the Government?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. He was looking after the purchase of plumbing materials, working in the Government's interest, with the contract that they had with the Government; and at this time the change was made when the Government canceled the Crane & Co. contract, and looked after the purchase of their own material.

Senator MCKELLAR. Are Crane & Co. in the enameled-ware business?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. They are manufacturers of steam supplies and jobbers of plumbing materials.

Senator MCKELLAR. What became of Capt. Maddock?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. He resigned and went back to civil life.

Senator MCKELLAR. He went back to work for his company?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Went back to his own company.

Senator MCKELLAR. Is that your purpose when the war is over?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I do not know where I can go; whether I can go back to the same company or not.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you any such arrangement?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. No, sir; none whatever.

Senator MCKELLAR. How long did they pay your salary to?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. I think they paid the half month of August, to the date of resignation. The understanding at that time was that I would be there, at most, only 60 days.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you bought from the company with which you were connected at the time at which you went into the service since you have been in the Army?

Maj. MCCUBBIN. Bought from that company?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes.
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. To what extent?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I am unable to give it to you in dollars and cents, but it has been a considerable amount of money.
Senator McKELLAR. Can you furnish us the exact amount?
Maj. McCUBBIN. We are working on that list now. Col. Willcutt is having all that matter tabulated and worked up.
Senator McKELLAR. Have you recently entered into considerable contracts with that company?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. When was the last contract?
Maj. McCUBBIN. We have never made any contract with them outside of that in July, when the blanket orders were made to cover 90,000 closet combinations. That company received a portion of that order; a large portion of the 90,000. If I remember right, it was——
Senator McKELLAR (interposing). How much was that in money?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I do not know. I did not figure that out.
Senator McKELLAR. As a representative of the Government, do you not figure out what it costs?
Maj. McCUBBIN. So far as my work on that end was concerned, I only compare and compile it, and that is submitted to what we call the board of review that is appointed by the general purchasing agent of Gen. Cole's division, and it is all submitted to them, the tabulation and all, for their approval. The total amount of the 90,000 was figured out, but for the different companies; what each of the different companies had was not figured. [Revised by Exhibit 2, pp. 611–612 post.]
Senator McKELLAR. Did you take bids on this?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes; bids were taken on those 90,000 closets and tabulated.
Senator McKELLAR. Have you the bids with you?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Not with me, but they are at the office.
Senator McKELLAR. Will you make them exhibits to your testimony? I want the bids that were made by the companies.
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Was this Sanitary Co. the lowest bidder?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Five or six of them were low bidders on the entire order.
Senator McKELLAR. Did they get it all?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir; they only had one part of it.
Senator McKELLAR. How much of it did they get?
Maj. McCUBBIN. They had, I imagine, roughly speaking, approximately speaking, one-third of the amount.
Senator McKELLAR. What proportion of all the work has gone to this company since you have been in the employ of the Government as purchasing agent of this particular kind of material?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Enameled ironware?
Senator McKELLAR. Yes.
Maj. McCUBBIN. I imagine, I should think, 6 per cent. Between 50 and 65 per cent.
Senator McKELLAR. What other concerns have gotten any at all?
Maj. McCUBBIN. The United States Sanitary Manufacturing Co.
Senator McKELLAR. Who represents that company?
Maj. McCUBBIN. The Washington representative, you mean?
Senator McKELLAR. Yes.
Maj. McCUBBIN. They have none here at all.
Senator McKELLAR. Is not Mr. Arrott connected with it?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Mr. Arrott is president of that.
Senator McKELLAR. How much has he gotten?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I am unable to say on that.
Senator McKELLAR. Was it a large or small amount?
Maj. McCUBBIN. In comparison, I should judge with the total ordered, it would be a small amount. Do you wish the names of some of the others on that?
Senator McKELLAR. What others did you give any to?
Maj. McCUBBIN. There was the Kohler Co., of Kohler, Wis.; the Iron City Sanitary Manufacturing Co., of Pittsburgh.
Senator McKELLAR. You do not remember how much they got?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir. That is what we are working up now, to get the exact number of orders and the tabulation, and all on that.
Senator McKELLAR. There is not any trouble about it, is there? Have you not got books that show it?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No; it is just the compiling of the records, and getting them all together. Col. Willcutt's order was to go back to the beginning and get the whole information up.
Senator McKELLAR. Who is the representatives of the Standard here?
Maj. McCUBBIN. In Washington?
Senator McKELLAR. Yes.
Maj. McCUBBIN. Mr. George Herth, jr.
Senator McKELLAR. What are your relations with Mr. Herth?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No relation whatever.
Senator McKELLAR. Are you good friends?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. What is the degree of relationship, so far as friendship is concerned?
Maj. McCUBBIN. That is all; only no more than friendship. We have known each other for a number of years.
Senator McKELLAR. Do you wish to leave it that way? Because I am going to investigate it rather carefully and I do not want to mislead you at all. Are not those relations very close and intimate?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Very friendly.
Senator McKELLAR. Are they not unusually close and intimate?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I would not think any more than some other friends I have got.
Senator McKELLAR. How often do you meet?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I see him probably three or four times a week.
Senator McKELLAR. Oftener than that?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Do you take lunch with him pretty nearly every day?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Quite frequently?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I have, until we were notified to stop.
Senator McKELLAR. That is since this investigation was started?
Maj. McCUBBIN. It was before then.
Senator McKELLAR. That you were notified to stop—before this investigation began?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No; before that.
Senator McKELLAR. When were you notified before that?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I think it has been, offhand, about six or eight weeks ago.
Senator McKELLAR. Who notified you?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Col. Willcutt.
Senator McKELLAR. How did he happen to notify you that your relations with this man were——
Maj. McCUBBIN. It was not particularly to one. It was a general order that was made—that was announced to us at a general meeting that we have at the close of the week, that we were told.
Senator McKELLAR. What other representative of a company had you been intimate with before that?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I have known Mr. Cline, of the United States Sanitary Manufacturing Co., for quite a number of years, and also Mr. Arrott.
Senator McKELLAR. Are your relations with either of those gentlemen intimate, like they are with Mr. Herth?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir. I do not come in contact with them.
Senator McKELLAR. Is there anything about your relationship with those two that would make your commanding officer issue an order in regard to them?
Maj. McCUBBIN. That order was for everybody. It said, "any vendors whatever"—everybody in the office, that order was issued to. I might say that I have known Mr. Herth—both of us were very close friends before either of us went with that company.
Senator McKELLAR. And since you have been here with the Government that relationship has been continued, and in the purchases you have made you have given your old company most of the business, have you not?
Maj. McCUBBIN. The only business they got, the prices were low, or they had the service or delivery of material.
Senator McKELLAR. Were they always the lowest?
Maj. McCUBBIN. If the prices were not always equal, we always found the shipment conditions better, or the location of some of the plants——
Senator McKELLAR. Was that the only instance? When you found the prices of others lower, is it not true that you, having been with that company, and having been on such intimate relations with its officers, you always found that, other things being equal, there was something else?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I did not let that interfere at all, Senator.
Senator McKELLAR. If you did not, why is it that all of the other companies, who have not been getting the business, feel so very much aggrieved? You having been the representative of this company up until the day you went into the Army, and since you have been in the Army having been in the most intimate personal and official relationship with the representative of this one company, and the other companies not getting any of the business, are you surprised that they feel somewhat aggrieved that you are showing great favoritism toward your old company?
Maj. McCUBBIN. From the information I have got I do not blame any of them for making complaint. As I understood, the representative of the Standard Co. told them that they had received a tremendous big order which they did not even have the opportunity to bid on. (Revised by Exhibit 2, p. 612, post.)
Senator McKELLAR. I will now ask you about that. Did you buy for the housing contracts?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No blanket contract order has been placed for the housing at all, except for the closet combinations.
Senator McKELLAR. That is not the question I asked you. We will get along better and much faster if you will just answer my questions.
Maj. McCUBBIN. That is what I want to do.
Senator McKELLAR. I do not mean to say that you mean not to. I am going to be very frank and very direct with you in my questions, and I want your answers in the same way, and I am sure you will give them to me since it has been called to your attention.
My question is, Are you buying for the housing?
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Are you buying under written contracts?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Are you just placing your orders with the Standard Co. for those contracts?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir; we are placing with the others, too.
Senator McKELLAR. Which ones have you placed orders with for the housing?
Maj. McCUBBIN. With the Sanitary Manufacturing Co.
Senator McKELLAR. How much?
Maj. McCUBBIN. They made a price here about 2 weeks or 10 days ago, which put their price lower, and since then they have had all of the enameled-ware business.
Senator McKELLAR. How long ago was that; when?
Maj. McCUBBIN. About two weeks ago.
Senator McKELLAR. Will you give the exact date?
Maj. McCUBBIN. I can give you the exact date on that.
(The witness later stated the date to be September 28, 1918.) (See Exhibit 2, p. 612, post.)
Senator McKELLAR. Now, Major, I am a perfectly frank man. You remember that this examination took place on September 25, just a little more than two weeks ago. I want to ask you if the only reason that you gave this other company one order was because these gentlemen complained to our committee, and it was developed for the first time that you were placing practically all the orders with your old company, and with your friend, and that therefore this other company got that order; is that correct?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir. I can get you the exact date. Mr. Kelly and Mr. Meyers of the Iron City Sanitary Co. came to the office and called, and asked if we had placed any blanket orders, if we had covered for all of the enameledware business, and I told him no, we had not; that we did not have our requirements. He asked if it was too late for him to submit prices. I told him no, he could submit prices any time.
Senator McKELLAR. Will you kindly answer this question: You and I are comparatively young men and have our lives largely before us.
Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Do you think that in passing upon the bids or quotations of these 12 or 14 enameled-ware companies that are asking for the Government business, in view of your long association with the Standard Co. and your knowledge of that company, in view of the intimate relationship that exists between you and Mr. Herth, the representative of that company, you can be absolutely fair and impartial toward all those concerns in buying for the Government? Now, just as man to man, heart to heart, is it not the very essence of human nature that you would give your own company, the company of your friend, the company that you have been employed by a long time and you know so well, the best of it? Now, is not that correct?
Maj. McCUBBIN. No, Senator; I can not say that I let that interfere at all. It was not my intention of doing anything of that kind.

Senator McKELLAR. Whether it was the intention or not, you know that we naturally feel very kindly toward our own?

Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. Will you furnish the prices at which all the goods that have been bought by you from the United States Sanitary Manufacturing Co. were purchased, the names of the articles, and the prices paid?

Maj. McCUBBIN. That report is being made up now for Gen. Marshall to submit to you, I am pretty sure.

Senator McKELLAR. Gen. Marshall told you, of course, about the complaints that had been made against you?

Maj. McCUBBIN. Col. Willcutt told me this. I was called to Gen. Marshall's office this morning, and he told me to come up here, that you wished to see me.

Senator McKELLAR. Had you never talked with Gen. Marshall about it before?

Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. It was only from Col. Willcutt?

Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes; Col. Willcutt.

Senator McKELLAR. Col. Willcutt told you that Gen. Marshall had called his attention to this testimony?

Maj. McCUBBIN. He said that Gen. Marshall had received word from you, I believe—I do not remember how he said that the word came to him.

Senator McKELLAR. Have you let any contracts since that time?

Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. How much stuff have you got contracted up to date?

Maj. McCUBBIN. On contracts?

Senator McKELLAR. What is the extent of your contracts with the Standard Co. now?

Maj. McCUBBIN. The only contract we have with them is for some closet tanks and bowls.

Senator McKELLAR. To what extent is that?

Maj. McCUBBIN. I imagine that they have on hand, on a rough estimate, maybe about 10,000 bowls and probably about 10,000 or 12,000 tanks. That is the only contract that they have.

Senator McKELLAR. There is no question about the capacity of these concerns to furnish these goods? There was active competition, was there not?

Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, competition. We have placed orders with some, Senator, and they turned them down.

Senator McKELLAR. Which ones turned them down?

Maj. McCUBBIN. The United States Sanitary Manufacturing Co., the Cahill Iron Works, and the Kohler Co.

Senator McKELLAR. When did the Cahill Iron Works get a contract?

Maj. McCUBBIN. I have got the date of that here. That order was made on July 19.

Senator McKELLAR. Do you not think that the Government ought to have a man buying these enameled goods who is totally disassociated from all of the various companies?

Maj. McCUBBIN. In purchasing, Senator, I do not see that that would have any connection at all with that.

Senator McKELLAR. Considering the fact that you had been the representative of the largest enameled ware company of them all, and yourself on the most intimate terms, as you have testified about, with the Washington agent of that concern, and in view of the order which Col. Willcutt has heretofore given in relation to your association with any representatives of any firms that were selling to the Government, do you not think that, looked at from the Government standpoint and not from your standpoint, a man with a knowledge of the business, but disassociated from all these supply firms, would be much better for the Government's interests?

Maj. McCUBBIN. I think that if I had the direct placing of the orders, or authority to place orders, that question should be brought up and changed, but I have no authority to do that.

Senator McKELLAR. You place the orders in the first instance.

Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. Who places them?

Maj. McCUBBIN. I only make the recommendations.

Senator McKELLAR. Has any recommendation of yours ever been turned down?

Maj. McCUBBIN. No, sir; I can not say that it has.

Senator McKELLAR. Then, if you recommend them and none of them has ever been turned down, does not that make you really the placer of the orders—give you the power to place the orders?

Maj. McCUBBIN. They are all furnished in the tabulation of the bids, and it goes to the board of review.

Senator McKELLAR. I understand that, and I am perfectly familiar with these boards of review.

Maj. McCUBBIN. Yes, sir.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., Friday, November 15, 1918.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 248, Senate Office Building, Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR presiding.

Present, Senators McKELLAR (chairman), SUTHERLAND, and JOHNSON of California.

There appeared before the committee Mr. Theodore Ahrens, president of Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co., accompanied by Mr. Francis J. Torrance and Mr. George Herth, jr.

STATEMENT OF MR. THEODORE AHRENS, PRESIDENT OF THE STANDARD SANITARY MANUFACTURING CO.

Senator McKELLAR. Your name is Theodore Ahrens?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. You desire to tell the committee something about the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co.'s contract with the Government, and if you desire you can just go ahead and say what you like.

Mr. AHRENS. I will be very glad to do that, Senator, but I would like to ask first whether you would care to tell me just generally what these charges are in which we are implicated. We have never seen any written charges of any kind. All we have heard about it is hearsay.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you see the testimony of Maj. McCubbin?

Mr AHRENS. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. The substance of the complaint made is that Maj. McCubbin, now in the Construction Division, I believe, of the Quartermaster Corps, was formerly your employee; that he came from your office into the Army and was immediately given the position of purchaser of plumbing supplies and enameled ware supplies, which your company is engaged in selling, and that he has since that time virtually bought the greater part of such supplies from your company; that he was constantly in company with Mr. Herth, your "agent" here, taking lunch with him virtually every day until he was directed by his superior officer not to do so; that the other 13 or 14 manufacturers of these supplies were thus frozen out of any participation in the Government's business, and that your company had access to the plans of the Government and that when quotations were asked for, Maj. Cubbins very promptly informed your company of the quotations of others, and that you thereupon gave a lower quotation in the particular instance in order to get the business, and that you had yourself boasted at a public meeting somewhere—I have forgotten where—that you had a contract of 25,000 bathtubs, and probably other paraphernalia to go with them, and that on January 1, 1919, under orders of the War Industries Board, you having the only contract with the Government, all others of your competitors would be unable to get iron for the manufacture of this enameled ware, and in that way Maj. McCubbin would put all the rest of your competitors out of business and leave you with the only good business in the country. Now, that is about the substance of the testimony, as I recall it.

Mr. AHRENS. May I just answer that in my own fashion the best way I can?

First, I admit that Maj. McCubbin—formerly Capt. McCubbin—was in our employ before he went to work for the Government. We, like other manufacturers and business concerns, were asked to submit names of our people to the Government when the Government required such men. We did not submit Mr. McCubbin's name. My partner, Mr. Torrance, recommended a man from Pittsburgh, but Mr. McCubbin's name was submitted among a number of applicants and picked out by whoever the commanding officers were that had that matter in charge. Mr. McCubbin was indorsed by Capt. Archie Maddock, his predecessor in the office, a prominent pottery manufacturer in our line, who had the position that Mr. McCubbin occupied, but who had to give it up; and he, in fact, was instrumental in having Mr. McCubbin appointed or recommended him.

As to our getting a very large part of the business that Maj. McCubbin had to place, that may be true. I do not know how much Maj. McCubbin placed, all told, or what the total volume of it is—I have no figures—but we did furnish the Government a very large quantity of plumbing materials of all kinds, and enameled ironware, brass goods, pottery, and other plumbing material that we manufacture.

The reason, Senator McKELLAR, why we secured this business and why we got the larger part of it is contained in this sentence, that as the largest producers in our line, with a better organization and better distributing facilities, we were in a position to render the Government better service, and did so. Let me also give you this statement, that our prices were always right and in many instances lower than those of other manufacturers. Other manufacturers, in discussing Government business, have complained to us that our prices were too low. They told us this. Other manufacturers refused business—among them particularly the Cahill Iron Works, of Chattanooga, and the Standard Sanitary Co., of Pittsburgh—at prices which we were willing and glad to accept.

You know, Senator McKELLAR, that during these strenuous times this year, when the Government and everybody working for the Government had to exert every effort in their power to get deliveries to the Government promptly, the deliveries were of great importance. Deliveries of the larger quantities of material required by the Government could be made by us and could not be made by the other manufacturers.

Now, I would like to get this point strong, because it is a vital point. The other manufacturers were utterly unable to handle the Government business, because it came in such volume and in such short time that only my company's organization was then able to handle it, and if any other man had sat in Maj. McCubbin's chair and had had these orders to give we probably would have gotten from them about as much as Maj. McCubbin gave us. To illustrate that, let me say that in the Quartermaster Corps at Jeffersonville, Ind., which he has nothing to do with at all, we have been all of this year getting as large a percentage of the business as Maj. McCubbin gave us here.

Senator McKELLAR. That is under Col. W. S. Woods.

Mr. AHRENS. That is under whomever might be the commanding officer in charge there; and that has nothing to do with it, but our Louisville branch has sold many thousands of dollars' worth of goods to that department at Camp Taylor and elsewhere. We have been furnishing the great bulk of all the goods required.

At the nitrate powder plant at Nashville our Nashville house has furnished hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of goods, none of which Maj. McCubbin had anything to do with.

As we came up here, Senator, Mr. Herth pointed out a large lot of buildings around here, dormitories the Government is putting up for war workers, a lot of them, and he said that we have furnished every plumbing fixture in every one of these dormitories, and Maj. McCubbin had nothing to do with it. It was purchased by the contractor through a local jobber.

One more point that I think ought to be brought out. We have been of great service to the Government. We have saved the Government many thousands of dollars in preventing the price of enamel ironware and other plumbing fixtures going beyond reasonable limits. Our books are open for your inspection; you can see that at the price we are working there is not any more than a reasonable profit.

I want to say particularly about those complaining manufacturers that we have monthly meetings, in which we meet together and discuss particular conditions, and they have repeatedly come to me and complained of the fact that the prices at which we were selling to the Government were too low, and that we ought to advance these prices. We do not think so. We can furnish you written evidence on that point that will corroborate what I say. Now, I believe I have in substance answered the complaints as near as I can do so.

Pardon me, there is just one more thing, as to this order in question that I was supposed to have been boasting about. The matter came up when I was called here to attend a meeting at Mr. Humphreys, of the building material section of the War Industries Board, at the New Willard Hotel, a meeting of manufacturers in our line. At that meeting, at which I was asked to preside, Mr. Humphreys called particular attention to the fact that the Government wanted to deal with first hands only—that is, the manufacturers—and not through jobbers or any middlemen, and that the Government had this enormous housing program in view, about 60,000, 80,000, or 100,000 houses that they might have to have for war workers, and that the Government would have to place that directly with the manufacturer, and only with such people as could give prompt service.

After that meeting I called on Maj. McCubbin, then Capt. McCubbin, with Mr. Humphreys. I had never met McCubbin in his office before, and had only met him once here before, outside of that, since he was appointed, and I asked McCubbin whether any such housing program was in view, and McCubbin said it was. He said that his department might place an order in the very near future for anywhere from thirty to sixty thousand sets of plumbing fixtures, which would be a bathtub, a water-closet, a kitchen sink, and lavatory. That was called a set. Of course that was a very large order, and I was very anxious to get a proportionate share of it for my company. I discussed this matter at some length—probably an hour, maybe longer—and urged Maj. McCubbin to place the order at once, because in the condition that our business was in at that time, the labor supply being very uncertain and the wages advancing continually, we had in mind to advance our prices generally to everybody, including the Government, because our cost was going up all the time; but I said to Maj. McCubbin that if the Government could place an order of that size and we could get our proportion of it, that would enable us to reduce our cost, and we would have to take the order at the price ruling at that time. Figuring that there were going to be 60,000 sets of fixtures needed, I could not see that we ought to get less than half of that, because we had always, for the last five years, as the records of the trade show, done 50 per cent of this work. That is a well-known fact. Our competitors admit that and state that themselves. So that I told McCubbin that I thought that we could handle 25,000 sets of these fixtures. We got no definite order or promise from Capt. McCubbin that such an order was placed with us or would be placed with us, but the captain did say to me that he believed such an order would be placed in the near future, and that we would get our share of it; that, however, these orders would have to first be confirmed by or O. K.'d by the board of review, I think he called it; in other words, that we could not consider it an order until we had a definite order in writing.

Now, I made a mistake, Senator, in going back to Pittsburgh and saying to this meeting of the manufacturers that I had such an order, as I had no order or my company had no order from the department for any such amount of fixtures at that time. We were getting business, however, every day from them. My reason for making the statement at the meeting was this, that owing to the unsettled condition of business for the last 18 months, the manufacturers had been reporting to the Secretary every month the total number of orders they received, the total number of shipments they made, and the general condition of their stocks, enough so that we would have an intelligent idea of the business of the United States in our line. Now, as to my reason for advising the other manufacturers that we had this order: As I say, I made a mistake in taking it for granted that we had this order, but I felt pretty sure from the general condition, knowing what I did about the general condition of the building in our line, that I would get that portion of the order. In fact, an order of that size could not have been filled without our support, without our taking part of it. My reason for saying and reporting on this order was that I wanted to give the other manufacturers an idea of what was coming, and I said at the meeting that the housing program that the Government had in contemplation was for about 60,000 sets of fixtures, and that Maj. McCubbin had told me he expected to distribute the order around among several manufacturers.

I also stated at the meeting, however, Senator, that we had no formal or written order, that the order would have first to go through its proper channels and be O. K'd before we would consider it an order.

Senator McKELLAR. Is there anything else that you wish to say?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; I think that covers pretty well all I would like to say.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you consider that Maj. McCubbin had given you this order or not?

Mr. AHRENS. I did consider——

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; that he had given you the order.

Mr. AHRENS. I believe, while the major—he was then Capt. McCubbin—did not definitely give me an order, that I would get an order of approximately that size; yes, sir. I felt so from the conversation.

Senator McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, Maj. McCubbin had given you a verbal order for it?

Mr. AHRENS. Not in so many words. That is, he explained to me that an order, to be an order, would have to first go through the regular channels and be approved by his superior officer.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you advance the price?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; we did not advance the price that was fixed.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you, when you told your associates in the meeting at Pittsburgh—that is where it was, at Pittsburgh?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR (continuing). The other manufacturers—did you tell them at the same time that the prices would be advanced on these sets?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir—on this order?

Senator McKELLAR. On this order.

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir. I told them that we expected to take that order at the prices then ruling.

Senator McKELLAR. It is claimed that after securing this alleged verbal contract your company advanced the price to the Government and informally told the other manufacturers that this price would be advanced, and you would later give the other manufacturers a memorandum of the new prices. Did you do that?

Mr. AHRENS. We did not advance our prices to the Government.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you give the other manufacturers a memorandum of these new prices?

Mr. AHRENS. I could not answer that; no, sir. I did not know.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you have a memorandum yourself?

Mr. AHRENS. Personally; no, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Then do you not know whether a memorandum of the new prices was given them or not?

Mr. AHRENS. Whether a memorandum of the new prices we proposed to make to the Government was given them?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. AHRENS. Whether that was given to them or not?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. AHRENS. I could not answer; no, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, have you seen such a memorandum as that?

Mr. AHRENS. Personally, no, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Do you know whether such a memorandum was in fact prepared?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; I could not say. But, Senator, I would like to say again that we did discuss at that time the question of advancing prices and——

Senator McKELLAR. Well, it was entirely up to you as to whether or not the prices would be advanced? Maj. McCubbin just simply agreed to any price that you made, did he not?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; my understanding was that Maj. McCubbin got prices from enameled ware manufacturers—different manufacturers—and if our price was right we got our share of the business.

Senator McKELLAR. I will ask you whether or not Maj. McCubbin told you that he expected to turn over all this business to you?

Mr. AHRENS. He emphatically did not. He emphatically did not, Senator. Maj. McCubbin told me that on this large order in question he expected to split it up between several manufacturers. I never made a statement at the meeting that we had taken an order for 25,000 sets of plumbing fixtures.

Senator McKELLAR. What did you state at that meeting?

Mr. AHRENS. I said that we had an order from the Government for a very large quantity of plumbing fixtures for that housing proposition.

Senator McKELLAR. That you had a contract for a very large quantity?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes; or words to that effect.

Senator McKELLAR. All right, sir.

Mr. AHRENS. And I want to repeat, Senator, that I made a mistake in stating that we had an order before we had a real order—a written order.

Senator McKELLAR. When was that?

Mr. AHRENS. Well, I am somewhat shy on dates.

Senator McKELLAR. August or September?

Mr. AHRENS. Can you supply the date, Mr. Herth?

Mr. HERTH. The date of the meeting at the Willard Hotel that Mr. Humphreys held was August 27, so that it must have been after that. I think you left Washington on the 28th.

Senator McKELLAR. It was probably about a week later?

Mr. AHRENS. Probably September 5.

Mr. HERTH. It must have been in September, some time.

Senator McKELLAR. At that time you did not have this contract?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. You never entered into a contract after that time for these bathtubs and sets?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; we never received any such contract.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, you have testified exactly to the contrary about that, have you not?

Mr. AHRENS. Contrary? What is contrary to that?

Senator McKELLAR. I now call your attention to a photographic reproduction of an affidavit, apparently made by you and sworn to by you on the 25th day of September, 1918, and I will get you to see whether that is a photographic copy of your affidavit and signature.

Mr. AHRENS (after examination of paper). Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, if you will look at that, you will find where you distinctly state that you have a contract for 25,000 enameled bathtubs, 25,000 enameled roll rim sinks, 25,000 enameled washstands, and you have just testified that you did not have such a contract?

Mr. AHRENS. Senator, I believed at the time I signed that affidavit that I did have it, or that the order would be ours in a few days. Now, might I say here that we have had similar transactions with the Government. For instance, we have a shell contract with the Government on which we did not receive any order—that is, any formal contract—for months after we started on it; but we went ahead on it.

Senator McKELLAR. Then you are unavoidably driven to this conclusion, are you not, that the only way on earth in which this affidavit could be explained, in view of your present testimony, is that you were so absolutely sure that Maj. McCubbin would do whatever he was told to do in reference to letting these contracts that you considered it as made?

Mr. AHRENS. I felt so certain at the time that I signed that affidavit that the order would be placed—that the housing order would be placed—and that we would get that portion of it that I took that for granted. It was a mistake on my part and a mistake that I regret very much.

Senator McKELLAR. Why was this affidavit given?

Mr. AHRENS. This was gotten up for the purpose of enabling some of our people whom we wanted to retain in the company—in the manufacturing end of our business—to claim exemption from military duty.

Senator McKELLAR. Did you get exemptions for them on the faith of this affidavit?

Mr. AHRENS. I do not think so. I do not know that it was used.

Senator McKELLAR. Were any of them released?

Mr. AHRENS. It may have been used, but I do not know that any of our people ever obtained releases on that.

Senator McKELLAR. However, it was filed with the Provost Marshal General's office for that purpose, was it not?

Mr. AHRENS. It may have been in some instances. I am not certain; but I do not know that it was used to any extent. But it was made for that purposes—that is, it was gotten up for that purpose.

Senator McKELLAR. If you had been given a contract for these plumbing fixtures, consisting of bathtubs and sinks and water-closets and lavatories, and none of the others, none of the competitors, had been given any such contracts, or any Government contracts at all, under the priority orders of the War Industries Board permitting iron to be used for this purpose only by those who had Government contracts, that would have put all other enameled-ware manufactures out of business, would it not?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; not as I understand it. It would not have put them out at all.

Senator McKELLAR. How could they have gotten the iron?

Mr. AHRENS. There were lots of other Government departments purchasing these same supplies; and the other manufacturers have not been put out of business at all, Senator. The best evidence of that is that for all of this year and during all the period when we supplied to the Government a considerable quantity of plumbing material, these other manufacturers obtained a proportionately large share, just as large a share, of business from the rest of the United States.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, let us see if that is correct or not. I have before me here a statement of the shares of this particular business, which shows that the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co.—is that your company?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Was given $387,311.92; the United States Sanitary Manufacturing Co. was given $20,353.78; the Kohler Co. was given $9,311.30; the J. A. Mott Iron Works, $15,326.36.

This would indicate that, in round numbers, your concern got $387,000 worth of this particular business and all the other concerns together got $44,000 worth. In other words, your concern got about 90 per cent, just speaking roughly, under the control of Maj. McCubbin, who had been in your employ and who was, as shown by his own testimony, and has been, so closely connected with your company since he has been in the employ of the Government. Can you wonder that under those circumstances, when these other gentlemen were confronted with the priority order under which your company would be allowed to get iron for your needs because you had Government contracts secured in this way, and where they could not get iron because they had no Government contracts—can you wonder that they felt in very great fear that their business was going to be absolutely ruined and taken away from them, and that through this means of Government procedure, carried on by Maj. McCubbin, who had been in your employ, your business would be built up at the expense of theirs? Now, can you wonder that they complained? Just look at it as man to man.

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, Senator, if those were the whole facts in the case you would be absolutely right, but they are not. The business placed by Maj. McCubbin was only a small part of the business that was being placed at that time. My answer to your question is that the other manufacturers during this same period have sold more ware than we sold to the Government. In other words, they got their full proportion of the business; and, what is more, and I think this should have some weight, they got it at better prices than we were getting from the Government.

Senator McKELLAR. What profit did your concern make? What is your capital and what profits have you made on your capital within the last year?

Mr. AHRENS. Why, our capital is about $17,000,000; $16,000,000 in round numbers on the 1st of January, I think you had better say, and on that we showed about $2,225,000 profit, net, last year.

Senator McKELLAR. How much will it show this year?

Mr. AHRENS. Our profits this year, counting in our entire business, will show probably a half a million dollars more than that.

Senator McKELLAR. What was the amount of orders; at what price were these 25,000 sets of plumbing fixtures sold? Speaking roughly, what was the cost of them, each?

Mr. AHRENS. Can you supply that, Mr. Herth?

Mr. HERTH. The price on bathtubs at that time, as near as I can recall, was $19.25.

Senator McKELLAR. And the other three items, how much were they?

Mr. AHRENS. Pardon me, Senator, may I interrupt you just a minute?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. AHRENS. I said there were four items, but the water-closet was not to be considered. There are really only three features. These are enameled iron fixtures.

Senator McKELLAR. The bathtub is $19.25?

Mr. HERTH. I could not state exactly, Senator.

Senator McKELLAR. Approximately?

Mr. HERTH. The lavatory was around $7; approximately $7. We had a price on one at $6.65, or it might have been $7.04.

Senator McKELLAR. What is that?

Mr. HERTH. That is the lavatory. Then the sink, I think, was approximately $9; $9.25 or $8.75.

Mr. AHRENS. Altogether, about $34.

Senator McKELLAR. About $34?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes; and it would be twenty-five times $34 for the contract. That would be about right; $850,000, I think.

Senator McKELLAR (after making calculation). That would be about $850,000?

Mr. AHRENS. May I say one word more there, Senator?

Senator McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. AHRENS. The largest order we received from the Government was not through Capt. McCubbin, but through his predecessor.

Senator McKELLAR. Who was he?

Mr. AHRENS. Capt. Maddock.

Senator McKELLAR. Did he ever work for you?

Mr. AHRENS. No; he was a prominent manufacturer in Trenton, N. J., and he is a competitor of ours, Senator, and he placed that order with us because we know that he could give service, and service was of paramount importance at that time.

Senator McKELLAR. What average profit did you make on these goods?

Mr. AHRENS. We never took this order, or it was never filled—do you mean what average do we make on the enameled ware we sell?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; to the Government.

Mr. AHRENS. About 15 per cent; possibly 20 per cent; not over that. But in saying that we should bear in mind the fact that we have got to pay income taxes and excess-profit taxes out of that, and a very large share of it goes back to the Government.

Senator McKELLAR. There never has been a contract made about these plumbing fixtures, has there?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Have any of them been actually bought from you?

Mr. AHRENS. Have what?

Senator McKELLAR. Have any of them been actually bought from you by piecemeal?

Mr. AHRENS. We have, no doubt, since that time furnished similar goods to the Government. Mr. Herth can answer that better than I can.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Herth, will you just be sworn, please, sir?

(Mr. George Herth was here sworn by the chairman.)

Senator McKELLAR. Will you state whether or not you have sold to the Government any of these goods through Maj. McCubbin—any of these 25,000 sets?

Mr. HERTH. You mean, that applied on the contracts we have?

Senator McKELLAR. It does not make any difference whether they applied on those contracts.

Mr. HERTH. Oh, yes; we have sold some fixtures to the Government.

Senator McKELLAR. How many?

Mr. HERTH. I could not tell you that.

Senator McKELLAR. Can you give an approximation as to how many?

Mr. HERTH. Oh, yes; we have sold some; there is no question about it, we have sold them some. The question is this, how many of these fixtures were bought after all this controversy. That is the idea, is it not?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; in other words, it is charged, with how much truth I do not know, that when Maj. McCubbin found that he could not hand the entire contract of 25,000 sets of fixtures for plumbing, he then proceeded to buy as many as he could by piecemeal from your firm, without giving the other people any chance to bid on them at all.

Mr. HERTH. Yes; I will be very glad to give you the number of fixtures.

Senator McKELLAR. Yes. Now, do you know whether or not you have had any written request for quotations about that since the 25th of September?

Mr. HERTH. Have we got any written quotations on our different lines of fixtures?

Senator McKELLAR. No; have you received any written communications asking for quotations on these bathtubs and fixtures?

Mr. HERTH. We receive almost every day requests from the Construction Division for prices on all those fixtures—any fixtures that the Government may want.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Ahrens, would it be very much trouble to get a detailed statement, I do not mean of all the articles, but just a statement of the amount and nature of goods, of what you have sold the Government since the war began?

Mr. AHRENS. I will be glad to get that for you.

Senator McKELLAR. Of all sales?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir; I will be very glad to.

Senator McKELLAR. I would like it in compact form, if you can get it.

Mr. AHRENS. There will be no trouble about that. We can get you here in 24 hours a statement of all the goods and the business we have done with the Government in its various departments, you mean?

Senator McKELLAR. In various departments.

Mr. AHRENS. Since the war began?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. This question was raised: It is claimed that Maj. McCubbin would buy under very peculiar circumstances from you. For instance, the Cahill Co., of Chattanooga, complained that when it was wanted to buy some of these goods for use at Camp Greenleaf or out at Fort Oglethorpe, and they wanted them in a hurry, he did not ask for any bids or quotations or prices from the Cahill Iron Co., but he put these emergency orders with your company and had you send them by express, taxing the railroads to bring them into Chattanooga, when they already had the same material there, and costing the Government a large expressage. Do you know whether that is correct or not?

Mr. AHRENS. I can not answer that because I do not know, of course, what the Government did or did not. Perhaps Mr. Herth could give some information on that point.

Senator McKELLAR. All right; Mr. Herth, do you know?

Mr. HERTH. I think that is up to the others to show you. I do not know; of course we have shipped material to different places by express and by freight. I know of one case out at Camp Lewis where we had received an order, and the contractor wired us to ship it by express. That meant a whole car. I took that up with the department, and I wanted to know whether we should do it. We did not do that. So I could not say as to any particular order at Camp Oglethorpe, that might have gone by express there.

Senator McKELLAR. Could you look it up on your books?

Mr. HERTH. And find out just what we shipped there?

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; and when you get that information make it Exhibit 2 with this testimony.

Mr. HERTH. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Have you any agreement with McCubbin that he is to return to your employ when the war is over?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; excepting that there are some six hundred odd men that left our employ, a large per cent of our force, and went into the Government service, and we have said to every man of them, "When the war is over we are going to try to put you back right in the place you were in." We did not make a definite promise, because that would be impossible, but we said, "Every man that leaves our employ and goes into the Government service and comes back after the war, we are going to try to find a job for you." Therefore, to that extent, I would say that Maj. McCubbin had that promise.

Mr. HERTH. But you did not make that promise only to him. You never made that promise to any individual?

Mr. AHRENS. Oh, no; absolutely not.

Senator McKELLAR. Have you any other employees in the purchasing departments of the Government? Are there any at Jeffersonville, for instance

Mr. AHRENS. Where?

Senator McKELLAR. Have you any at Jeffersonville?

Mr. AHRENS. I do not know. I can not answer that question. And again, I will have to say that, for instance, at Camp Taylor, when the camp went up and they were working 24 hours a day, and day and night, and everybody was working as hard as they could, the people in the clerical departments there were overrun with work, and they did telephone down to our Main Street store, and they asked, "Can you give us a clerk? Your people know about these prices and discounts, and are familiar with the business, and can you help us?" We furnished such a man to them. I do not know whether we furnished such a man in Jeffersonville, but if we were called on to do so we did so, because we would think it was our duty to do so.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, again returning to the other feature of the same kind, where you had men working in various departments, the purchasing supply departments of the Government using your goods, and they did not have men on the inside in that way, do you think that your competitors would feel that they would naturally get a square deal on the whole circumstances?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir. My point is that when Capt. McCubbin or any other man in our company left our employ and went into the employ of the Government, he was no longer in the employ of the company, nor did we ask him in any way, shape, or form to prefer us over anybody else; nor have we in any way, directly or indirectly, told these people that we were going to take care of them or do something for them because of the fact that they were in the Government employ and had helped us to get business; absolutely nothing of that kind.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, would you give me a statement, and make it Exhibit No. 3 with your testimony, of any of your former employees who were employed by the Government or were loaned by you to the Government at any of these camps or depots where supplies were being handled?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir. It is quite possible that two or three people were furnished in that way; but might I say right there, Senator, that for a very responsible position in the construction department here, a position under Maj. Humphreys——

Mr. HERTH. And Maj. Sergeant.

Mr. AHRENS (continuing). And Maj. Sergeant, covering the entire plumbing field of the United States, they wanted a man to take charge of that, a man who had technical knowledge of the business and who could be Maj. Sergeant's right arm; and the jobbers and manufacturers of the Eastern Supply Association, representing all the prominent people in our business, came to us and asked us, as a patriotic duty to the Government, to allow one of our men, Mr. J. D. Tschopick, who was our general manager of furnishing housing, to accept that position, you see with the indorsement of all these men and including our competitors, and it was to be a dollar-a-year job; and we sent Mr. Tschopick on to see Mr. Sergeant. We told him that if it was necessary to give him up we would be willing to do so. We sent him on to see Mr. Sergeant and he convinced himself that the position was not one in which he could render the kind of service that the Government would expect from a man of his importance, but that it would require a man of lesser importance, and he declined the job; and subsequently some one else was appointed to the position, who now fills it, some one not connected with my company.

Senator MCKELLAR. I will ask you to make this photographic copy of an affidavit made by you, which you have identified, dated September 25, Exhibit No. 4 to your deposition.

Mr. AHRENS. I do; yes.

Senator MCKELLAR. I must go to the Senate now, and I must ask you gentlemen to excuse me, but I will let you know later in the day when we can continue with your testimony, either this evening or to-morrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 11.45 o'clock a. m., the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., Saturday, November 18, 1918.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10 o'clock a. m., in room 248, Senate Office Building, Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR presiding.

Present, Senators MCKELLAR (chairman), SUTHERLAND, and JOHNSON of California.

There appeared before the committee Mr. Theodore Ahrens, president of Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co., accompanied by Mr. Francis J. Torrance and Mr. George Herth, jr.

STATEMENT OF MR. THEODORE AHRENS—RESUMED.

Senator MCKELLAR. Proceed, Mr. Ahrens.

Mr. AHRENS. I do not remember exactly, but I think we were discussing, when the committee adjourned yesterday, the reason why I thought I had an order for 25,000 of these sets.

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes; I think so. That is all right. Go on.

Mr. AHRENS. Let me say that when I testified yesterday I did so without having read the charges against Maj. McCubbin and ourselves. I did not know that we were in what is called an open hearing, a public hearing, and we were entitled to have a copy of the testimony; but Mr. Johnson, the official stenographer, told us just after the adjournment yesterday, and stated that we could have a copy of the testimony furnished to us, and we asked him to prepare a copy and let us have it. He did so, and we received it late last night. Now, I wanted to make that statement preliminary to this other.

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes; you could have had a copy of the testimony at any time, of course.

Mr. AHRENS. Now, Senator, I would like to add this to what I said yesterday before you adjourned the hearing. In regard to the interview I had with Maj. McCubbin, and during which we discussed the large housing contracts the Government proposed to place, or had in mind to place, with the manufacturers, my testimony as given yesterday is correct, but I would like to add that after going into the subject thoroughly with Maj. McCubbin and after calling in Maj. Noss, who was consulted on the length of time it would take to put the orders through the department, I left Maj. McCubbin's office with the impression that he would recommend to his superior officers the placing of a large order for plumbing fixtures required for the housing program, which was estimated at about 60,000 sets, and would give us an order for 25,000 sets of these fixtures. The major asked us whether we could make deliveries of this quantity by the end of the year, and I told him we could.

Senator MCKELLAR. Mr. Ahrens, since this investigation has begun you have received a letter from Maj. McMubbin asking you to deny that you had a contract with him, have you not?

Mr. AHRENS. He asked me to write a letter to the Enameled Ware Manufacturers' Association, denying that we had such a contract.

Senator MCKELLAR. Have you a copy of that letter of Maj. McCubbin to you?

Mr. AHRENS. No, sir; I have not; but it is on file in the Pittsburgh office.

Senator MCKELLAR. Will you furnish a copy of that letter and make it Exhibit No. 5 with your testimony?

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. Do you remember the contents of the letter—the substance?

Mr. AHRENS. The substance of it was that Maj. McCubbin called my attention to the fact that I had made such a statement at a meeting of the Manufacturers' Association, and he wanted me to retract it, as he had not given me any such contract. That is as near as I remember it. I did not answer that letter, or I did not write the letter that he wanted me to write to the association, because it was not an association matter; that is, the matter never came up in the association meeting. It came up in an informal meeting or discussion that we had after the adjournment of the association meeting, at which I made this statement that we had this order. Therefore I did not think it was necessary or proper for me to write to the association about it or drag them into it.

Senator MCKELLAR. With reference to the affidavit about the order for 25,000 sets of plumbing fixtures, did you not get a priority order for coal on account of that affidavit?

Mr. AHRENS. We asked for a priority order for coal, based on the Government contracts we had, and we did include that order among the rest, Senator.

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes. When was that priority given?

Mr. AHRENS. Shortly after this whole matter occurred. I do not recall the exact date, but it was before I made up my mind that we would get these contracts or this order.

Senator MCKELLAR. It was after the 25th of September, was it not, and after this hearing had begun and Maj. McCubbin had then been before our committee?

Mr. AHRENS. I could not say that, because I do not know when you had the hearing, and I never talked to any of the officers that were connected with this case or with any of the other manufacturers, until recently, and the only talk I had with any manufacturer connected with the case was with Mr. Caldwell the day before I saw you in Memphis, when I talked to him over the long-distance wire. May I make a statement here, Senator?

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes; I would be delighted to have you make any statement you wish.

Mr. AHRENS. What I wanted to say, Senator, was that we have received during this year a number of large orders from the Government, and which we considered orders, before we had the formal contracts. Our first shell contract, amounting to about $1,500,000, was given us practically on the same basis; that is, we went ahead and ordered $400,000 worth of machinery before we had that contract. In fact, we did not get the contract for three months after we had begun operations and after we had invested of our own money approximately $400,000 for machinery. But we had the assurance from the officers of the Ordnance Department that the order was going through in good shape, they gave us an order number, or something like that, and told us not to be uneasy about it, and we went on and spent $400,000 of our own money preparing for that contract three months before it was executed.

Senator, this year was a year of big things, and they were done in unusual ways. This order, while it looked big, was not, in proportion to many other orders that were handled and placed by the Government in the various lines.

Senator MCKELLAR. Without expressing any opinion, but merely giving you my version, it seems to me that your man McCubbin has misled you into a very serious situation. I gather from what you have said, and what he said and what all have said that appears in this record, that you had every reason for believing that you had a contract; and yet when this investigation came up, knowing that he had been simply acting as your agent, he has besought you and others to protect him by making statements, and statements that are going to get somebody into a very serious situation. In other words, he has gotten you and he has gotten a half dozen other officers here to assure me or to assure this committee that you had no contract, and that is exactly what you have testified to and that is exactly what these other men have testified to, when, as a matter of fact Maj. McCubbin in my judgment—I am not expressing it as my final judgment at all—appears to me to be conscious that he has done wrong himself, and in trying to protect himself he has gotten all you gentlemen in a very remarkable situation. You are in the attitude of having sworn to one state of facts on the 25th of September and another state of facts on the 15th of November, which is, I must say, a very serious thing, and all because of this system to which I have been opposed from the very beginning, of having men interested in the business buying for the Government. It is all wrong; absolutely wrong.

You ought to take your chances before a fair and impartial purchasing officer, a man who has no connection with your business, and the department is all wrong in permitting a man from your office to buy goods from you; and I would say, and it would not make any difference who it was, that if an officer was selected from one of these other concerns, your competitors, to do that, it would be perfectly outrageous, unfair, and unjust to you, just as this is unfair and unjust to them. It is a system that can not be defended. I know that Gen. Marshall is a splendid man, and I can not understand how he permits Maj. McCubbin to be in the employ of the Government for 10 minutes after this is disclosed. It is a matter that I had hoped that Gen. Marshall would remedy promptly by suggesting the dismissal of Maj. McCubbin from the service of the Government. He should not be in the service of the Government. It is indefensible that he should be in the service of the Government; and I say this after having heard all the proof—that is, all that has occurred up to this date—and I think practically all the facts are in. He has gone officially and gotten up a very elaborate statement here, and ex parte statements here from witnesses, Maj. Noss and others, that do not agree with the facts in the case at all, and I am surprised to find that anything like that should be done. It is not warranted by the facts and it is not fair to the Government at all, and it is not fair to these other people—not a bit—and as a matter of fact I am rather inclined to think it is unfair to you, because you believed that you had a contract, and have not got one.

Mr. AHRENS. Senator, I did that honestly; yes, sir. I must say, however, in justification of Maj. McCubbin, that I think I am to blame in the matter in simply having talked about having the contract before I had it. Let me put this feature before you, please. I certainly had no business talking to my competitors about having a contract simply, as somebody said yesterday, to boast about it, because that would not do me any good and would only cause bad blood.

Now, my reason for making that statement and telling these other gentlemen that we had such a contract—please remember that I qualified that at once by saying that we had no actual order; no written or formal order—but my reason for advising them of it was because for the last two years, or since the Government has been in this war, we have been cooperating together very closely in every way in order to keep this industry from going on the rocks; and I felt it my duty to advise these other manufacturers that a very large order, a much larger order than was promised me, would be placed, and that they were to receive, or some of them were to receive, the balance of it. Now, that was my reason for making that statement at that time. They, however, took it in another way.

Senator MCKELLAR. Now, the trouble about that is that the very first time that the 60,000 has ever been brought forward has been in your testimony. It has never been mentioned heretofore. The number mentioned has always been 25,000, and Maj. McCubbin has never said anything about 60,000 at all, and he certainly ought to have known something about it if he knew anything about the business at all. In the next place, these gentlemen, none of them, understood that there was anything but the 25,000-set order; and in the next place——

Mr. AHRENS. Pardon me, Senator——

Senator MCKELLAR. Just one moment.

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. In the next place, under the priority order, they would have all gone out of business and you would have had an entire monopoly.

Mr. AHRENS. I have a little information on that point that I would like to give you.

Senator McKELLAR. Those are the things that make this situation absolutely intolerable, and it just shows that the department was all wrong in employing a man out of your office to buy goods from you for the Government. That is absolutely indefensible. The Lord Jesus Christ 2,000 years ago said that no man could serve two masters, and no man can. No man can serve the Government and serve you, too. It is absolutely impossible.

Mr. AHRENS. That same thing happened in a hundred offices, Senator.

Senator McKELLAR. Yes; and it is indefensible, wherever it has been done.

Mr. HERTH. They had to do that because they had to go out into the firms in these different lines in order to get somebody who knew about these things.

Senator McKELLAR. No; the people have gone out, in these different lines, to put these men on the Government, and greatly to the discredit of the Government and to the injury of the Government in securing contracts this way. It is indefensible—absolutely indefensible. I say that with all respect to you, because I think that you have put yourself, by reason of the signing of that affidavit, into an indefensible position, and perhaps into one which you are not entitled to be in, and you have been put in this position by a system that ought not to be tolerated for a moment, and I do not see how any superior officer of Maj. McCubbin can permit him to be in the Army for a moment. He ought to be discharged, and discharged instantly. He ought to have been discharged when this matter was first brought up.

It is a crime against the Government to let a man of that sort, who permits himself to be used in that way, to stay in the employ of the Government; and of course if the War Department can not do it, I am going to see that it is done by publicity. Publicity is the best thing, in this country anyway. I feel outraged at this action on the part of the department and on the part of this whole situation. I speak very plainly. I am a very plain-spoken man. Perhaps I have said here on this record what I ought not to have said. Perhaps I ought to have let the Department of Justice handle this matter in its own way. But, being familiar with it, I feel that you have permitted this young major in the Army, who has been indulging in practices that no man should have indulged in, to put you in the most awkward attitude that you have ever been in in your life, as you will certainly find out. It is an indefensible attitude, and really one that grows out of the course of business that ought not ever to have been tolerated. I may have said more than I ought to, but it is as much in your favor as it is against you. That is the situation. I do not wish you to be unaware of it, because the fact is that you have testified twice——

Mr. AHRENS. I am fully aware of it.

Senator McKELLAR (continuing). And in one case your testimony is opposed to your testimony in the other case.

Mr. AHRENS. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. And I am really inclined to think that you are not entitled to be in that position.

Now, if there is anything else that you wish to say, I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. AHRENS. I would like to correct some statements here that we discussed yesterday.

Senator McKELLAR. I will be glad to have you put in anything you wish. I want to be absolutely fair about the matter.

Mr. AHRENS. I never had this testimony of Maj. McCubbin and these others until last night. I went through it late last night, and these are points I would like to bring to your attention.

Senator McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. AHRENS. First, the statement of C. F. Arrott (p. 389 of transcript) and the statement of "Certain manufacturers" (p. 398).

On page 386 you asked this question:

"Senator McKELLAR. If the Government business is confined alone to the Standard Co., what effect would that have on the various other companies engaged in this business, in view of this order?"

To that Mr. Arrott answered:

"Mr. ARROTT. We will have to close our plants down, or turn our plants into making shells or some other Government essential work."

Senator McKELLAR. Yes, sir; you want to comment on that?

Mr. AHRENS. I want to comment on two cases that I am going to cite. I will read now an extract from the "Statement of certain manufacturers," which is appended to the hearing of September 25, 1918, as follows:

"With the further restrictions recently made by the War Industries Board covering expenses for general building improvements and repairs, the present market for sanitary enameled ware is virtually confined to the Government's requirements; and to meet these ultimate requirements, were the business equitably distributed, all of the plants producing enameled ware would be permitted to live."

Now, on that I want to say that these statements are contradicted by the fact that the other manufacturers of enameled ware have, in the first nine months of 1918, sold $4,731,067.69, or 45 per cent, fully 45 per cent, of the enameled-iron ware disposed of in the United States, Government business included. The total amount of enameled ware purchased by Maj. McCubbin from the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. was less than $400,000, being therefore less than 7 per cent of the Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co.'s sales of enameled ware, and less than 4 per cent of the total business of the country. Our own sales of enameled ware for the same period were $5,385,286.51. This makes a total business of enameled-iron ware in the United States for those nine months of $10,566,354.20. These figures are taken from the reports that we all furnished the secretary of the association, and can be verified. I mention them here to show that after all the amount of business Maj. McCubbin gave us was insignificant compared to the total business of the country, and that these other manufacturers got millions of dollars' worth of business outside of Maj. McCubbin's office.

Senator McKELLAR. But the question that they raise in that testimony is that after January 1, 1919, if the war had continued, you would have been the only man with priority orders, and they would have had to have closed down their businesses, and you would have had the entire enameled-iron-ware business of the country; and I am inclined to think that if Maj. McCubbin had had his way that would have been mighty near the situation.

Mr. AHRENS. Senator, that is not the situation.

Senator McKELLAR. And that is an indefensible situation, of having an employee in the Army in that position.

Mr. AHRENS. I agree that that would be indefensible, but that is not the situation. All these manufacturers sold many hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of enameled ware for Government purposes through other channels. That is the point I am trying to bring out.

Mr. NUGENT. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if, after his recital, he does not think a lot of these people should be in the penitentiary instead of longer serving as agents of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator my view about it. I recommended that these men be discharged from the service of the Government just after this proof was taken, and my recommendation was ignored by the War Department. There was not any question in my mind as to what ought to be done with them. I do not think we ought to turn these contracts over to them to settle. I think if we do we will be derelict in our duty, and I, for one, will not do it if I know it. I feel that it is my duty to bring this testimony before the Senate and before the public when passing upon these contracts, and, Senators, it is our duty as representatives of the Government to see to it that the Government is treated fairly and right in the validation of its contracts and in our settlement in regard to them.

I believe that is all I have to say.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was going to yield the floor, but I will be delighted to answer any question.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has given a great deal of attention to this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that it is a pretty thankless job, too. I have given great attention to it, but a man gets criticism for it. Any man who defends the interest of the Government now is always criticized for it.

Mr. POMERENE. I mean the legislation now pending rather than the particular contracts to which the Senator refers. Is there anything in either of the bills now pending before the Senate which will protect the interests of the subcontractors?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there is not.

Mr. POMERENE. I have submitted an amendment which will be printed in the RECORD in the morning that will take care of the interests of subcontractors

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is a very wise provision. I do not see that the Government has any possible contractual relation, as I understand it, with a subcontractor. It is a difficult provision.

Mr. POMERENE. That is entirely true, but this is my thought about it: If A has a contract with the Government, known as the head contractor, as we call them in Ohio, or in some places the prime contractor——

Mr. McKELLAR. Subcontractors they are called everywhere.

Mr. POMERENE. I am speaking of the head contractor, and he sublets to half a dozen other men.

Mr. McKELLAR. Which is always done.

Mr. POMERENE. They furnish their product to the head contractor for the Government. It seems to me that any money which goes to the head contractor for that product ought to be reserved for the benefit of the subcontractor who contributed toward the execution of the contract with the Government; in other words, that the money which the head contractor gets from the Government should not go to the general creditors of the head contractor at the expense of the subcontractor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I think there is a great deal of merit in his contention, and there is but one way in which it can be effectuated, and that is to put the whole matter in the hands of an independent commission, because the War Department is under no obligation to consider subcontractors. All that is settled by the War Department in these contracts. I do not see how you are going to enforce that obligation upon the department. Many of them have already been settled; but if you will put it in the hands of an independent commission and require the commission to adjust the claims of subcontractors, there is no reason in the world why it can not be done, and I will join the Senator in that.

Mr. POMERENE. There is nothing in the amendment which will be inconsistent with the provisions of either bill, as I understand them.

Mr. McKELLAR. That can be worked out. I will look at it when it is printed, and we will see what can be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course, what the Senator from Tennessee has been discussing with respect to leaving to the department the absolute right to adjust these matters is scarcely pertinent to the matter before the Senate, because the House bill is not the bill before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the only bill that is before the Senate, I will say to the Senator. These other measures are amendments to it, and if the matter of protecting the Government is not pertinent, then I am utterly unable to understand what is pertinent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I understand that perfectly well, but the Senator has been arguing all the afternoon that there ought to be a commission, and there is not any proposal here that there should not be a commission. The substitute offered to the House bill provides for a commission, and the bill reported by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] provides for a commission. So we are not confronted with anybody proposing that this matter should be left entirely to the War Department. That is the point I make on that score.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I have explained that fully. The difference is that under the Chamberlain substitute the commission is merely an appeal commission, and you can not get anything before it except by appeal. Under the Hitchcock amendment the commission has full and plenary powers to do justice to all.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the difference, but I did not understand that the Senator really expressed much preference one way or the other, just so there was a provision for a commission that took it at some stage of the proceedings out of the hands of the War Department having the entire charge.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. What I am trying to enforce on the Senate is that I believe in a commission with full power and authority to act—a real commission, not simply an appellate commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; I understand the Senator, but still I come back to the original proposition that the measure before the Senate is the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, which proposes a substitute for the House bill, and that report and the bill as reported provides for a commission.

It is a question now for the Senate to decide whether to adopt the substitute to the House bill or not. That is the sole question. Of course, they have a right to amend the substitute, and I take it nobody here is contending in opposition to the adoption of the substitute. I have not heard of any contention.

There is something to be said on the other side of the question if I cared to take the time of the Senate, which I do not, because I realize that this is an urgent matter. It is a matter that ought to be attended to, and we ought to enact this legislation and get it behind us, because there are people in all portions of the country vitally concerned, some of them on the very verge of bankruptcy, as the Senator from Tennessee will recall the testimony before the committee particularly upon that subject, waiting for some adjustment of the differences between them and the War Department, adjustments that are honest, adjustments that are made necessary because the conditions could not be avoided by anybody; in many instances irregular contracts, not the fault of the contractor, not the fault of the department, but irregular, growing out of the very necessities of the conditions and the very urgency of the cases; so no one is to be blamed for that situation. All of a sudden contractors are notified to proceed no further; you are not to go on with your performance. The contractor says, "All right; what will you do about adjusting this case: I have ordered a whole lot of material; I have gone to a great deal of expense; I have incurred obligations; here are men idle on my hands; what are we going to do about it?" Of course, the War Department says, "We will adjust the matter on a fair and equitable basis; come down." They come down and they get together and agree as to what is a fair and equitable basis, and the War Department says, We will adjust it by paying you so much; are you willing to accept that? The contractor says, "Yes; all right."

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. When they go to settle they find when they offer the adjustment to the comptroller the comptroller says "No; you can not settle that sort of thing because this contractor had no contract under the law and you have no authority to pay it; you can not adjust it." There they are. As I said, it is nobody's fault, but the law is such and the conditions have been such that these situations have arisen, and these losses are pending, and they ought to be adjusted, and they ought not to wait a day about it. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would just like to ask the Senator this question. The Senator heard the testimony of Mr. Rice, of the firm of Myrick & Rice, in dyestuffs. Would the Senator feel that the Government's interest could be properly looked after when Mr. Rice, representing the Government, settled with Myrick & Rice, representing the dyestuffs?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I would not. I did not read the testimony, but from what the Senator says about it I would not think of that sort of a thing, and I do not think that is contemplated by anybody. I do not think it is contemplated under the House bill, known as the Dent bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would he not be one of the men who would act on the board, acting for the Government? He has been acting for the Government in buying all this dyestuff.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know whether Mr. Rice is still acting for the Government in this matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows he was acting a short time ago.

Mr. FLETCHER. As one of the adjusters.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is the man who has charge of that division, and he is the one who makes the contracts. If he comes along and makes a settlement with his own concern would the Senator be satisfied with that?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have never said that. Mr. Rice was one of the original board of adjustment. He was one of the parties concerned in making purchases for the Government at the time the purchases were being made; but I do not understand that he is one of this board of adjusters; and he is certainly not on the appeal board of adjustment. That board is composed of Mr. Garnett, of Virginia; Mr. Malone, of New York; and Mr. Lehmann, of New York. That is the board that is now acting in that capacity. None of them are members of the military forces; they are all three of them from civil life. I mean to say that they are not officials of the War Department; they are civilians. I believe there was some talk—and perhaps that was done—of a sort of commission being issued to them in order to qualify them in some relation so that they might administer oaths; but they are citizens from civil life. They compose the board that is now acting upon this matter. Mr. Rice is not on it, and Mr. Jones is not on it. Those I have named are the ones that compose that board.

I say this matter ought to be speeded, because of the existing situation. Contractors all over the country have hundreds of thousands of dollars involved. Some contractors have only a small amount involved, but it is a great deal to them, although it be small as compared with the claims of other contractors. These contractors are suffering from the lack of an adjustment which would be fair and honorable and equitable and right, and which everybody would agree should be made. However, there is no power to make it and the object of this regulation is to authorize those adjustments.

The law as it stands is found in section 3744 of the Revised Statutes, showing exactly the requirements to make a contract with the United States Government. If a contract is not made in accordance with that law, it is not a valid contract, and any payments made in pursuance of it or under it, or any adjustment on it is rejected by the comptroller and will not be passed by him. No adjustment, therefore, can be reached. That is the law, and I will ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 3744. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Secretary of the Interior, to cause and require every contract made by them severally on behalf of the Government, or by their officers under them appointed to make such contracts, to be reduced to writing, and signed by the contracting parties with their names at the end thereof; a copy of which shall be filed by the officer making and signing the contract in the Returns Office of the Department of the Interior, as soon after the contract is made as possible, and within 30 days, together with all bids, offers, and proposals to him made by persons to obtain the same, and with a copy of any advertisement he may have published inviting bids, offers, or proposals for the same. All the copies and papers in relation to each contract shall be attached together by a ribbon and seal, and marked by numbers in regular order, according to the number of papers composing the whole return.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator understand from the statement which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has made that these three gentleman—Charles A. Rice, H. L. Bailey, and Malcolm Donald—are on the adjustment boards?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rather inferred from the statement of the Senator from Tennessee that these men were on the regional boards; and if so, I think it is quite a serious statement to make.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon misunderstood me. I said these gentlemen were chiefs of their several divisions.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a different thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. And had charge of these contracts. Under the committee substitute, which is known as the Chamberlain substitute, primarily officers of the War Department would settle these contracts; and as to the board about which the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is talking, that board only has jurisdiction when the case comes up on appeal. These officers will settle it; and if they can not settle it with themselves, how can they settle it?

Mr. FLETCHER. But they are not on the board at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not want the Senate to get the impression that these men were on the board or were adjusting these contracts; and the Secretary of War would certainly be a very foolish business man if he undertook to put them on the board.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is entirely right. So when the Senator from Tennessee asked me the question if I would stand for a settlement made under those circumstances, with this gentleman on the board, I said no; but he is not on the board. He was one of the original agents of the Government in making the purchases, a head of a division, but I do not understand that he is an adjuster of those contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the War Department's machinery now is that those officers of the War Department who have in charge these contracts attempt to arrive at an adjustment. Suppose there is a legal contract, they will arrive at an adjustment; the War Department follows their recommendation in the matter, and that ends it. The board of which the Senator speaks has nothing in the world to do with it. The question I ask the Senator from Florida is, Is he willing to settle it by these gentlemen?

Mr. FLETCHER. Except that the department arrives at an adjustment in pursuance of such investigation, study, and recommendation as the board may make, I take it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. It is an appellate board. The testimony disclosed to us that it was an appellate board entirely. For instance, if Mr. Donald, representing the clothing and equipage division, settles with the various firms with which he is connected, that simply goes through as a matter of course, and the settlement is made. The Senator may be satisfied with that kind of a settlement on behalf of the Government, but I am not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are 8 of these adjustment boards in Washington and 24 of them throughout the country all told. These boards are the boards before whom these claims are presented. They make their recommendation to the Secretary of War. If that recommendation is not satisfactory, then it comes to the board of which Mr. Garnett, Mr. Lehmann, and Mr. Malone are members, and they review it.

Mr. NUGENT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows the personnel of those committees; if he knows how those committees are made up which are now adjusting these contracts? Are they made up of the gentlemen who made the contracts in the first instance?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not; not at all. They are designated by the Secretary of War to make the investigations as to the particular matters which are presented in connection with these contracts or quasi-contracts.

Mr. NUGENT. Does the Senator know——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Florida will yield to me for a minute, I will say this, which, I think, will probably answer, as well as it can be answered, the question which the Senator from Idaho has asked.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think these boards are made up of the chiefs of the divisions that made the contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is not a scintilla of evidence before our committee in reference to who compose the smaller boards. They did not give us the names of the members of the appellate boards who are officers in the Army, and were made officers in the Army purely for the purpose of sitting on appeal.

As to the lower boards, who are on them, who they are, what connection they have with the gentlemen with whom they are doing business, we have no knowledge whatsoever.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know their personnel.

Mr. NUGENT. The Senator can not enlighten me with respect to that?

Mr. McKELLAR. It can not be done, because we have not the information.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know the personnel of these different boards—8 of them in Washington and 24 of them throughout the country—but I presume we can get their personnel if that is important. I do not understand, however, that the personnel composing those boards is made up of the same persons who made the contracts.

Mr. NUGENT. I should like to know their personnel, I will say to the Senator, before the vote is taken with respect to this matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I can get that information for the Senator.

I have here a letter from Assistant Secretary of War Crowell with regard to Senate bill 5261, which is referred to as the Hitchcock bill. Inasmuch as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] based his remarks on a comparison between that bill and the substitute now pending before the Senate, I think it is worth while to refer to that letter and to have it printed in the RECORD. I will not take the time to read it; but I think Mr. Crowell mentions that the department has already provided for these boards, although I am not sure that he gives the method of making up the boards or how they are constituted. But the letter does state:

> In addition to being utterly unable to do its work, the adjustment board provided by S. 5261 is entirely unnecessary for the reason that the War Department already has established and at work a machinery adequate to handle efficiently and promptly all settlements. Without now going into the details, the department has a central board of contract review in each of the eight supply bureaus in Washington; also a total of 24 local or district boards in various sections of the country making settlements for the Ordnance Department and the former Quartermaster Corps. The department has also established in Washington a board of contract adjustment to which the Secretary of War refers for decision all cases in which the contractor and the contracting officer are unable to agree. Furthermore, several thousand contracting officers, accountants, investigators, and other assistants are now at work helping the boards to make prompt settlements. On the enactment of the legislation which the War Department has requested, this machinery is prepared to start immediately on the cases in which contracts were not made or signed as provided by law.

That is the machinery that is now in operation. I do not know whether it is necessary to go further into detail as to how it is constituted than that or to set out the names of all of the officers who are connected with it. I am quite sure that the machinery is ample to arrive at an honorable and a fair adjustment of these matters and to assure to the Government that there is no fraud being committed as against the Government. I will ask to have Mr. Crowell's letter inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 6, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am glad to avail myself of your suggestion that I submit to you a statement with reference to S. 5261, known as the Hitchcock bill.

This bill provides for the establishment of an adjustment commission of three members who shall decide all cases of cancellation of existing valid contracts or orders of the War Department, and also all cases in which a contract was not made or signed as provided by law.

The War Department is strongly convinced that the enactment of this bill would cause great and unjustifiable delay in settling the proper claims of contractors and would most unjustly throw hundreds of contractors into bankruptcy.

It would first be necessary for the President to appoint the members of the commission. The Senate must then confirm the appointments. Thereafter the board must organize and familiarize itself with its duties. If regional boards of examiners are appointed, their membership must be selected and their machinery started.

These various steps will necessarily take time. After they have been performed the board will find itself confronted with a situation which will absolutely prevent prompt settlements. This situation will result both from the magnitude of the task and from the almost total lack of assistance provided for the board in the bill.

Incomplete figures show that the total number of settlements which would come before the board would exceed 25,000. That this is an impossible task for three men in one year is, of course, obvious.

Your attention is invited to the fact that the entire appropriation provided by the bill is only $50,000; that $35,000 of this amount will be used to pay the salaries of the three members of the board and the secretary; and that only $15,000 will be left for the accountants, investigators, clerical assistance, and office expenses of the central board and the entire expenses of all such boards of examiners as may be appointed. Comment on the utter inadequacy of such an appropriation is unnecessary. At the very outset, the board would be choked with work and this condition would become hopelessly more aggravated each succeeding week.

As bearing on the personnel and the expenditures necessary in the determination of large numbers of cases, by prompt and informal methods, your attention is invited to the following illustrations:

(1) The Interstate Commerce Commission consists of nine members. During the year ending October 31, 1917, the commission decided approxiately 1,000 formal proceedings and 10,000 informal proceedings, with an organization of approximately 700 employees and an expenditure of $1,060,000 chargeable to this work. The Hitchcock bill proposes to have three men decide in one year at least twice as many cases on an appropriation less than one-twentieth as large.

(2) The public service commission of New York, second district, a typical State public service commission, decided in 1917 approximately 450 formal proceedings and 1,350 informal proceedings, a total of 1,800 proceedings on an appropriation of approximately $400,000. The Hitchcock bill proposes to have the adjustment commission decide approximately 20 times as many cases with one-eighth the appropriation and personnel.

In addition to being utterly unable to do its work, the adjustment board provided by S. 5261 is entirely unnecessary for the reason that the War Department already has established and at work a machinery adequate to handle efficiently and promptly all settlements. Without now going into the details, the department has a central board of contract review in each of the 8 supply bureaus in Washington; also a total of 24 local or district boards in various sections of the country making settlements for the Ordnance Department and the former Quartermaster Corps. The department has also established in Washington a board of contract adjustment to which the Secretary of War refers for decision all cases in which the contractor and the contracting officer are unable to agree. Furthermore, several thousand contracting officers, accountants, investigators, and other assistants are now at work helping the boards to make prompt settlements. On the enactment of the legislation which the War Department has requested, this machinery is prepared to start immediately on the cases in which contracts were not made or signed as provided by law.

The War Department feels very earnestly that the good faith of the Government is pledged to a prompt settlement and payment of all just claims of contractors. The department stands fully ready to make such settlements and is already doing so where the contracts were made and signed as provided by law.

The Dent bill, as amended by the House Committee on Military Affairs, will meet the requirements of the situation if amended in a few further respects as suggested by the War Department and will enable the department to utilize its existing boards and its existing personnel to make prompt settlements of all formal and informal contracts.

Very sincerely, BENEDICT CROWELL,
The Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have not any serious objection to this commission. The only thing I am fearful about is that it will delay matters. I believe that the War Department is perfectly capable of dealing with this whole situation if Congress will simply say that certain contracts which ought to have been formally executed and would in the ordinary course of events have been formally executed are valid contracts. If Congress will simply give the authority provided in two sections, I believe, as I have said, that the department will adjust these matters in such a way as to bring relief to the contractors who have undertaken to serve the Government in its hour of need, and to bring it speedily; whereas if we add to that some sort of commission to review what the department does, we will create a condition which will inevitably mean uncertainty and delay. The contractors are not in a position where they can endure that hardship. They have suffered enough already; there has been enough delay already, and, indeed, there has already been too much.

What will it mean, for instance, if we have to wait here until the President names three members who are to constitute the proposed commission? We have had some experience in that direction. We know that whenever the President is authorized to make an appointment it does not come here the next day or the next week. Sometimes it takes several weeks and sometimes several months for the name to come in. The President has difficulty in finding men to fill these responsible positions, and an appointment on this commission is a responsible position, a position that calls for $7,500 a year as compensation.

That is another thing that is made necessary by this bill. It is proposed to spend $50,000 a year, in my judgment, wholly without any necessity at all. It is necessary to set up a court with clerks and stenographers and records, and all that sort of thing—a regular court machinery.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is also in the committee bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know it is, but I am totally opposed to it. I am opposed to that provision in both bills. I am opposed to the creation of a commission, but I am not going to delay the bill by making any great contest about it. I take it as being the best thing for us to do in order to get some action on this legislation, for other members of the committee seem to be against me on that idea. It is true that both bills—the bill of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the bill now offered as a substitute—provide for a commission, but I repeat I think it is a useless thing, an expensive thing, a costly thing for everybody concerned, to the Government as well as to the contractors, because it means delay. It will be weeks and weeks before we get the three names before the Senate, and then they must be confirmed by the Senate. Both the bills provide for that, and that may take several weeks. We do not know how long. And then after they are appointed and confirmed by the Senate and begin the work they have got to establish their headquarters, their apartments, and organize their forces for conducting this inquiry. So we are going to have claims pending before that court until most of us in this Chamber have passed away, and we will never hear the end of them. It seems to me an absurd thing to establish a court here to deal with these matters which ought to be adjusted without any delay at all and without all of this expensive machinery.

If we provide this commission, we are establishing a fifth wheel to the coach, for we have the Court of Claims anyway without this provision, which may be resorted to where there is a valid contract, and when we make valid contracts that are now irregular we open the way so that any contractor can secure justice, even though he has to bring suit finally in the Court of Claims. But here it is proposed to establish another court ahead of the Court of Claims. We already have the War Department and the whole machinery of that department, with all of its boards, and a final appeal to the Secretary of War himself.

Then, after that, it is proposed to create a commission before which the contractors may go. They can thrash out the matter before the commission, with years and years of delay and detail in connection with proceedings there, and then, after the commission has rendered a decision, they can go to the Court of Claims. When will we reach an end to these matters that are in dispute between citizens who have endeavored to serve the Government and the Government itself? I think it is a useless and expensive piece of machinery that ought to be eliminated from this bill.

Furthermore, coupled with the proposal to establish a court is a provision that it shall be composed of men, according to the very language of the bill, who are pledged to look after particular interests on that commission. One is to represent the War Department, the other is to represent the Department of Justice, and the other is to represent the contractors, I presume; "the business interests of the country," the bill says. In other words, we are creating a court composed of three members, every member of which must go there pledged to look after some particular interest. That is a ridiculous kind of court to create. It is not a court of justice. A court of justice ought to be absolutely free and unhampered to deal with the facts, the law, and the justice of the controversy, and not be composed of partisans, as this bill specifies they must be. It is proposed to create a court of justice to pass upon the claims and to constitute that court of men appointed for the very reason that, respectively, they represent specially, particularly, and peculiarly conflicting interests.

That is another objectionable feature of it; but, as I have said, I am not going to take up more time in discussing the commission idea. I think it is absurd and ought to be eliminated from the bill, and I may offer an amendment to that effect before we get through with it. However, I would rather have the bill passed even with the unnecessary, useless, and expensive provision with respect to this commission than not to have it at all. I want to see the legislation enacted promptly. It ought to have been enacted before this time. It is a pity to have had all this delay about it. There are citizens who have rights, whose rights the department recognizes, and who are suffering daily by reason of the technicalities obtaining which prevent the settlement with them now. They ought to be settled with, and they can be settled with, and I am in hopes that most of them will be settled with without any appeal to this extraordinary commission.

I think there are safeguards thrown around the whole matter by provisions of the bill which protect the Government in every way, although I do not think that anybody is contemplating robbing the Government. I think it is undisputed—the authorities themselves admit it is undisputed—that there are contractors who are entitled to the adjustment and settlement of their rights and their just claims, but they can not get them as the law now stands. This bill opens the way for them to get what is due them. The danger would be rather that the department would be strict with them rather than that the department would not be strict enough. I fail utterly to see that there is any necessity for a commission. It merely puts upon the Government an additional expense, and it is going to cause inevitably serious delay and thereby hardship where there is no occasion for it. As I have said, I think that very likely before we are through I shall offer an amendment to strike out the provision for the commission, but I am not going to delay action on this bill by insisting strongly on it or taking up time discussing it further. I desired, however, to mention these facts in connection with the matter, and to urge, as I have said, speedy action upon the bill, in order that we may afford the relief that ought to be afforded and which those whom it will affect are entitled to receive.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on January 23 the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association adopted a resolution in relation to a provision in this bill, which I wish to take just a moment to read into the RECORD, and when the proper time comes I desire to discuss it to some extent. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association earnestly urge the passage by the Senate of H. R. 13274, as reported by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN on January 20, with an amendment, subject, however, to the important modification that wherever the right of appeal therein is given to the Department of Justice such right be eliminated.

A provision of this nature places upon the Department of Justice a duty to investigate all contracts or orders now pending validation, adjustment, and final settlement, and will cause a serious and unnecessary delay, to the great detriment of business, and will cause a great financial loss to customers of banks and seriously interfere with the employment of labor.

We believe that there are adequate laws existing to protect the Government in the payment of contracts when validated, and that section 2 of the bill in question protects the Government in the validation of informal contracts and the completion of contracts to replace informal orders and agreements.

At the proper time, Mr. President, I may offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, although at this time I do not care to do so.

From what has been said this afternoon by members of the committee, it seems to me that this bill ought to be guarded a little more carefully in certain particulars than it is; but if there is to be any relief whatever granted to the business interests of this country, let us have early action and let us perfect the bill so that there can not be criticisms against the Government such as have been referred to here to-day. I am rather surprised at what has been said upon the floor of the Senate, and yet I presume if we went into an investigation of all of the departments of the Government we would find that some unheard-of, unthought-of actions have been taken at a time when the demand was pressing, when the question of money counted nothing, and when the main consideration was the question of time. I can not conceive, Mr. President, how the conditions related here to-day can be justified or defended.

To my mind the department itself ought to have taken those matters in hand immediately, and they ought to have been rectified long ago. I have no doubt that there must be some legislation granting relief to the men who have furnished materials to the Government and who in many cases abandoned their regular business to do so, and who have not only all of their capital invested in producing the materials furnished to the Government in time of war but a great deal more. I think the chairman of the committee well said that unless some relief is granted, and that quickly, there are a great many institutions in this country which are going to be driven to the wall financially.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, we have before us a bill of the House of Representatives for which the committee has submitted a substitute. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is now in order to offer an amendment to perfect the House bill before the substitute is voted on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask to have printed so that the Members of the Senate may have it to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is an amendment to the House bill proposing to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That comes under Rule XVIII, which was adopted for the very purpose of avoiding what was known as amendments in the third degree. That rule makes the House bill one question and the Senate committee amendment another question, and each is subject to amendment, under the rule the part to be stricken out having precedence in the matter of amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then when the amendment comes up to which the Senator from Nebraska just called attention, will that be voted on first or will we vote on the committee amendment first?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is an amendment to amend the House bill, it must be voted on first.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rather think that the Senator's amendment is practically a substitute for the House bill. Is it not, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the suspicions of the Senator from Oregon are pretty well founded, but I believe that technically I am within the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, Mr. President, I confess to my ignorance of parliamentary law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of this opinion: The Chair has been sitting here this afternoon, and has heard incidentally, on the side, what was attempted to be done. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Nebraska has a right to move an amendment as in lieu of the amendment offered by the committee; and the Chair thinks, also, that amendments may be offered to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. While the Chair has not seen it, from what the Secretary tells the Chair the Chair does not believe it is an amendment of the part that was stricken out at all. It is in lieu of that. The Secretary says, however, that the Senator does save part of the House text.

Mr. SMOOT. He has the right, however, to perfect it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; the Senator has a perfect right to do that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in addition to having the amendment printed, I should like to have it printed in the RECORD. I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not have it read?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am perfectly willing to have it read, although I have suggested to the Senator in charge of the bill that we could not make any more progress to-night, and that we ought to have an executive session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator when we will be able to get copies of his amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment will be on the desk of Senators to-morrow morning.

The amendment of Mr. HITCHCOCK is as follows:

In line 3, page 1, after the word "That," strike out all down to and including line 24, page 3, and insert the following:

"Where during the present war and prior to November 12, 1918, officers or agents acting under authority of the Secretary of War have placed orders or made contracts with manufacturers or contractors for war supplies or materials, or for the performance of work thereon, or for the construction or enlargement of plants or other preparations necessary to furnish supplies or materials for the War Department, the procurement of which has heretofore been authorized by Congress, and any of said orders or contracts has been partly or wholly performed, or expense has been incurred by the manufacturer or contractor prior to the 12th day of November, 1918, in preparation or partial execution of said contract or order, the fact that any such contract or order or agreement has not been made in the form or signed in the manner required by law shall not invalidate the same if it was entered into in good faith and lacked only the sanction of a contract in legal form. Nothing herein provided, however, shall be held to validate any contract, order, or agreement given or made by an officer or agent of the War Department not legally qualified or authorized to give a formal legal contract, except where such officer has signed as the representative of a superior officer authorized to make such contract, nor to permit an officer to make such contract with any company, corporation, or firm in which he has, or had at the time, directly or indirectly, any interest.

"SEC. 2. That in all cases as above included it shall be lawful to make payments under the terms of the contracts or orders so made or given to the extent that performance thereof has been made, expenditures incurred, or supplies thereunder have heretofore been received and accepted by the United States, provided that payment in such cases shall not exceed the fair value of the supplies or materials delivered to and accepted by the United States, together with remuneration for expenditure properly incurred in preparing to perform said contract, orders, or agreements.

"SEC. 3. That in case of the cancellation, suspension, or annulment of any contract, order or agreement as described in this act, by the Secretary of War, or officers or agents acting by his authority, and in cases where no property or supplies have been delivered to and accepted by the United States, or where only partial delivery and acceptance has been made, contractors shall file with the Secretary of War within 60 days after the passage of this act any claim for remuneration arising out of the discontinuance, cancellation, or suspension of such contract, agreement, or order, properly itemized and set forth. Each claim shall thereupon, or as soon as possible, be transmitted to and filed with the commission hereinafter provided for, together with a statement attached thereto, showing the amount, if any, which the War Department deems to be justly due to said claimant. If the claimant shall file a statement offering to accept the amount awarded by the War Department in full for said claim, the commission shall, within 10 days, order the same paid in the absence of evidence that it is excessive.

"SEC. 4. That for the adjustment of all claims arising out of the cancellation of contracts, orders, and agreements for supplies or materials of war, as described in the foregoing paragraphs of this act, there is hereby created an adjustment commission to be composed of three members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, one representing the War Department, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the business interests of the country, none of whom shall be interested in any contracts with the Government or have an interest in any firm or corporation having war contracts, who shall hold their offices for one year and receive as compensation a salary of $10,000 each. It shall be the duty of said commission promptly to examine and pass upon all claims for compensation and reimbursement arising out of cases as set forth in this act for supplies furnished, expenditures or obligations necessarily incurred, or materials purchased under faith of contracts in legal form or orders received from officers and agents of the Secretary of War as heretofore set forth.

"SEC. 5. That in each case, as soon as the commission has made an award, the contractor shall be entitled to receive the same upon giving receipt in full of all demands against the United States arising out of the transaction, or if the contractor is not satisfied with the amount so awarded he shall be entitled to receive, and shall receive at once, 75 per cent of the amount that has been awarded him, and he shall thereupon be entitled to appeal the case to the Court of Claims, which is hereby given jurisdiction to hear the case and render final judgment in such sum as may be required to reimburse the contractor for supplies and materials delivered to and accepted by the United States and expenditure necessarily incurred in good faith in the partial performance of the contract or order above referred to, or in preparing for the same.

"SEC. 6. That in no case, however, shall any award, either by the commission or the Court of Claims, include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States and a remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

"SEC. 7. That the purpose of this act being to secure prompt settlement of claims, the commission is authorized to make its own rules and regulations and to hear and determine the issues informally and promptly upon presentation of the case. The commission is authorized to appoint, under such rules and regulations as it shall prescribe, one or more regional boards of examiners to serve in such districts throughout the country as the commission shall fix and determine to investigate and determine the facts concerning claims, legal or equitable, that may be presented as herein prescribed. The members of such board shall be composed of one representative of the War Department, one representative of the Department of Justice, and one from the business interests of the region, none of whom shall have any interest in the contract, directly or indirectly, and receive no compensation, save and except such per diem compensation as shall be fixed by the commission. Whenever the commission shall refer to any such regional board of examiners any claim they shall proceed informally to hear the parties, take the proofs, and return the same promptly to the commission with their recommendation thereon.

"SEC. 8. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the reasonable expenses of said commission, to be paid out upon the warrant of the chairman, who shall be chosen by the commission from among their own members, and approved by the secretary, who may be selected by the commission, and who shall receive a salary of not exceeding $5,000 for the period of one year, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be determined by the commission."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials; to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors and manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims on canceled contracts or orders, to provide for the partial payment of awards pending final determination, and for the creation of an adjustment commission."

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the order of the Senate heretofore made, directing the reading of the Farewell Address of George Washington upon the 22d day of February, immediately following the reading of the Journal, the Chair appoints for that purpose this year the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ROBBINS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions received from the House of Representatives on the death of Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 25, 1919.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of 34 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 430) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT, under the second resolution, appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. KING, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. WATSON, Mr. BAIRD, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. KNOX the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I move as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, January 28, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 27, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, help us to do Thy will this day. If we are in darkness, give us light. If we are weak, make us strong. If we wander from the paths of rectitude and duty, call us back; that we may be the instruments, in Thy hands, for the promotion of Thy kingdom upon the earth. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 25, and of Sunday, January 26, 1919, was read and approved.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report (No. 989) the second deficiency bill, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky reports a deficiency bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15140) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the life and public services of the late Gen. Joseph S. Smith, of my State, to-day buried at Arlington, with military honors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the life and public services of the late Gen. Joseph S. Smith. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if the late Joseph S. Smith was a former Member of this body?

Mr. HERSEY. He was not. He has been the general manager since the late Civil War of two soldiers' homes of this Nation, and he had distinguished military service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print a letter from an old soldier, consisting of 20 lines, from the Battle Mountain Sanitarium.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter of 20 lines from an old soldier at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM,
Hot Springs, S. Dak., January 23, 1919.

From: The Battle Mountain boys.
To: Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD, M. C., Washington, D. C.
Subject: Gratitude.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND NEIGHBOR: I desire on my own account and in behalf of 300 members of Battle Mountain Sanitarium to express our heartfelt gratitude for your success with others in blocking the Gandy bill.

Wish you could have seen the joy expressed by the boys to-day when the Omaha Bee came, with an account of the defeat of the bill, with the names of all who were active in blocking it, and your name was mentioned as one. This did me much good, as I told the boys that I was sure that you would be there in our interest when the time came. So many who are here have tried to live in other places, but on account of this climate they return and say there is no other place that agrees with them, and the treatment does them the good that they get here. And for this and other reasons I am asked to write you in behalf of all the boys and thank you for this and the many good things that you have done for us boys.

We all join in wishing you health and years of active life.

Very truly, yours,

THREE HUNDRED MEMBERS OF B. M. S.,
By SOL. FARBAUGH.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read a very short letter from the Pension Commissioner, and desire to make a request concerning the same.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will see the substance of it I do not think he will object.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question for debate. The gentleman asked that a letter be read, and he put the motion that it be read.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair said that without objection the letter would be read.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair meant. Is there anybody objecting?

Mr. WALSH. I reserved the right to object and asked the topic on which the letter was written.

Mr. BLANTON. Several days ago——

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know what the letter is.

Mr. BLANTON. Several days ago I had printed in the RECORD a report of a special committee of the Pension Bureau concerning the act of March 4, 1917, which showed——

Mr. WALSH. The letter is about a pension law?

Mr. BLANTON. Indian pensions. It showed the parties in certain commands who were entitled to pensions and those who were not. The commissioner has written a letter stating he would like to have 100 copies of that document for answering inquiries in case it should be printed as a House document. I wanted that letter read as a basis for the request that it be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, January 25, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I was much pleased to read in the RECORD of January 20, 1919, your remarks concerning the act of March 4, 1917, granting pensions to certain Texas volunteers, etc.

If it be published in pamphlet form, we would like very much to have at least 100 copies in the Pension Bureau that we may use it in answering inquiries. Thank you very much.

Very truly, yours, G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this report as printed in the RECORD several days ago be printed as a House document with this letter of the commissioner as a preface to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not read the matter which the gentleman had inserted in the RECORD, I am sorry to say, but, as I understand, it was an official ruling of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. The commissioner appointed a special committee of five experts in his department to pass upon the old muster rolls of Texas and other ancient documents there bearing upon the act of March 4, 1917, in order that it might be determined which commands of the various ones there that engaged in Indian fighting, and so forth, were entitled to benefits under this act and which were not. A great number of applications have been filed in the Pension Bureau for pensions under this act, and many of the applicants are not entitled to pensions.

Mr. WALSH. I think they have a mimeograph machine down at the Pension Bureau. I object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Did my colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD, ask that his letter be read or merely incorporated?

The SPEAKER. He asked that it be printed in the RECORD.

HOSPITAL AND SANATORIUM FACILITIES FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary, I think, under the rule to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13026. Does not the House resolve itself automatically into committee?

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13026, with Mr. HARDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13026, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. There are remaining 10 minutes to the proponents of the bill and 32 minutes to the opponents.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I understand there was some arrangement by which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] would transfer five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. Will he do that now?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. I will transfer five minutes from this side to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Making 15 minutes in the control of the gentleman from Florida and 27 minutes in the control of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will use some of his time, I shall be glad.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think there is no Member of the House who is not willing that our returning soldiers should receive all the care, all the attention, and all the consideration and hospital treatment which can be given to them. But the bill before us, in my judgment, should not be passed, for the very good reason that the Government now owns and controls a sufficient number of hospitals to take care of all the soldiers that we are likely to be called upon to take care of.

I think it is clearly understood, and yet it might be necessary to say, that the bill provides for hospitals to be operated under the Public Health Service, and under the provisions of the bill the hospitals which the bill provides for are not intended for the soldiers who return from the front. It is intended, as Dr. Banks, who is the Chief of the Bureau of Public Health Service, said, for the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. These patients, in the main, although there are a few others, are those who have never been sent overseas. In fact, they have never been mustered into the Army. They are rather those who have passed the local board of examiners and have been brought to the various cantonments and Army posts and have been rejected and returned to their homes as being physically unfit for military duty. So that we want to have clearly before us a correct understanding of the proposition.

Now, we may as well be frank in order to have a clear understanding that the hospitals which this bill provides for will be administered under the Treasury Department, and the hospitals we now have, of which we have an abundant supply, are being operated under the War Department. It seems to me that here there is a conflict of authority.

I do not want to make statements based on my opinion, rather on the evidence submitted at the hearing.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. In a moment. I shall try and make no statement that is not borne out by the hearings before the committee. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. How does the Bureau of War Risk Insurance get jurisdiction over the men who are not mustered into the service?

Mr. KREIDER. By the provisions of the conscription act which we passed. It is contended that when we selected men from private walks of life and compelled them to appear before our local boards, where they were examined by physicians appointed by the Government and pronounced to be physically fit or sound and sent to the cantonments and thence returned because of being physically unfit, the law presumes that they were physically fit when they were passed by the local boards, and therefore they become beneficiaries under the selective-service law.

Mr. MAPES. That is the provision in the war-risk insurance act?

Mr. KREIDER. That is the provision now.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Is not the gentleman slightly mistaken? Does not that law provide that they shall have been passed and shall have gone into the service of the Government, and then so-and-so?

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I desire to refresh his memory and call his attention to the hearings. There he will find that in the hearings, No. 14, page 31, the fact I referred to is brought out very clearly.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. DYER. I do not want to ask the gentleman a question except in this way: This is a bill which, I understand, involves an expenditure of $10,000,000?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes; $10,500,000.

Mr. DYER. Reported under the rule?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Probably not one-fourth of the membership of the House knows anything about it.

Mr. KREIDER. I think that is true.

Mr. DYER. And we have present here 15 or 20 Members. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 264 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. HARDY in the chair.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of those Members who were not here before the roll call, I will state that I tried to explain who were the beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and in reply to the question of the gentleman from Missouri I will direct his attention to the hearings, No. 14, page 31, where the following statement is made by Dr. Charles E. Banks, chief medical officer for the War Risk Insurance Bureau:

Dr. BANKS. The original bill provided for that contingency, but Congress amended the act some time in July, by which, under the language of the law, "the above-named officer, commissioned officer, or enlisted man shall have been held to have been in sound condition when inducted into the service." Now, The Adjutant General holds that a man is inducted into the service the moment he is passed by the draft board. Consequently, everybody—good, bad, and indifferent—is eligible for the benefits of the war-risk insurance provisions who comes into the Army from the draft board.

I could go on and read further, but I think that answers the question as to who are the beneficiaries, in the opinion of Dr. Charles E. Banks.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. I prefer not to be interrupted until I finish my statement. I am quoting from the hearings, which the gentleman can refute, or the accuracy of the statements contained in which he can question, if he desires.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to direct the attention of the gentleman to the law, section 300.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will give me time, he can direct my attention to the hearings, the law, or anything else he sees fit. But, as my time is limited, I also wish to call attention to the question as to who these hospitals are for. At the same hearing the chairman of the committee asked the question as to whom these hospitals are for. And the direct reply was that they are for the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Read page 34 of the hearings.

The reason I am dwelling on that is to show that these hospitals are not intended to be built for the benefit of the returning soldier who has seen actual service, but that they are intended for those who have become beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau through the method which I have tried to explain. It is perhaps needless to say, because I think the majority of the Members know, that during the summer of 1918 the War Department made great preparations in the way of building hospitals in order to take care of the number of wounded whom they believed they would be called upon to take care of. At that time they had supposed that the war would probably continue during 1919; but when the armistice was signed, on the 11th of November, they immediately canceled a large number of the contracts for the building of hospitals on which they had entered, knowing that when those hospitals which were under construction were completed they would have enough and more hospital capacity than they could possibly use.

Statements have been made as to the number of beds available and the number of beds occupied. These statements have been inserted in the RECORD and in the minority report. They have not been brought up exactly to date. This morning before I came on the floor of the House I called up the Surgeon General's Department and asked how many vacant beds there are now, and they told me about 45,000. I said, "How many more beds are about to be completed, not included in the 45,000?" And they told me about 15,000; so that there will be approximately 60,000 vacant beds. This is largely in excess of what they hope they will ever be called upon to use, and they stand ready now, as they have stood ready, to turn over hospitals, which it may be conceded are not the most desirable, but, nevertheless, they are hospitals that are suitable for the purpose, and have been used for the purpose, and are now owned by the Government of the United States and are fully equipped. The department is ready not only to turn over several of these hospitals now but possibly half a dozen more within from three to six months.

The number of wounded has been given as approximately 190,000, of whom approximately 60,000 have been brought to this country. Now, I have no intention to say anything that is not absolutely fair, but I want to direct your attention to the fact that when we speak of these 190,000 wounded we speak of all those who have been sent to the hospitals. I asked the department about the average length of time that is required for a wounded soldier to remain in a hospital until he is discharged. The statistics show that 80 per cent of those who are wounded return to the front within six weeks. Now, that includes the slightly wounded. The department, of course, has no official record, but it was stated to me that if you eliminate the tuberculosis patients and the insane the average stay of the wounded soldier in the hospital is probably about six weeks. Your attention has been directed to 120,000 wounded soldiers. Possibly out of those 120,000 over 60 per cent have been returned to the front and to their commands and are not now patients in any overseas hospital. At any rate, this last report that the Surgeon General's Department has is that there are approximately 104,000 patients now in hospitals on the other side, over 50 per cent of whom are not wounded but are sick, who will probably be returned to their commands. They are no doubt coming in and going out all the time, and they are not the men who will be sent over to this side. During the month of December there were returned about 23,000 soldiers who required hospital attention. It is assumed that during the next two months, before the 1st of April, every soldier will be returned who needs hospital attention. Now, that being the case, I might say here also that the average length of time that a tuberculosis patient remains in the hospital is six months, as testified in the hearings. Now, let us consider what is the project before us. We are considering building hospitals for patients whom we now have, but whom we will not have in 6 months or a year or 18 months or 2 years from now, the very earliest that any of these hospitals can be completed. Now here is the proposition before us: Are we going to authorize the building of hospitals and the spending of tens of millions of dollars to accommodate patients who will not exist when those hospitals are completed? We all want to do everything we can for the returned soldiers, but the Government of the United States now owns a sufficient number of hospitals to take care of the patients. Furthermore, as has been stated, the officials of the War Department and of the Navy Department have both gone on record over their signatures saying they will not discharge any soldier who requires hospital treatment. They have ample facilities for taking care of them themselves, and they do not purpose to turn these men over to the Public Health Service. This is not a political matter. In my humble judgment I do not see why we should now build more hospitals. I have not time to refer to the report of the American Hospital Association. This is the highest medical authority in the United States. They have gone on record and in a circular describing the treatment and the best treatment for our tuberculous patients. They are not advocating the building of large hospitals and segregating them in those hospitals, but prefer treating the men nearer their homes. I have no time to go into the nature of the disease. I think it is generally known that tuberculous patients usually prefer to keep in close proximity to their own homes.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman said that they will not discharge any soldier who requires hospital treatment. I did not catch the name of the authority that he quoted from.

Mr. KREIDER. The officials of the Navy Department and of the War Department have stated that they will not discharge soldiers or sailors so long as they require hospital treatment.

Mr. KEARNS. If a soldier thought he could get better attention at home than he could in the Army, would they not discharge him?

Mr. KREIDER. That is not pertinent to this bill, because this bill provides for hospitals to be used for the War Risk Bureau patients.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I confess that in the beginning I approached this question with many misgivings. At first I had views very similar to those expressed by gentlemen here who have spoken in opposition to the bill. The hearings will show that I asked questions which committed me to that viewpoint. But the more I studied it the more I became convinced I was in error. The one fact that stares our country in the face to-day is that we are just emerging from the greatest war that the world has ever known.

Unfortunately a large number of America's best and bravest boys have been wounded. These wounded soldiers must be cared for. Gentlemen say that we have by law pledged care, hospital treatment, and medical aid to the soldiers. Waive that, if you please. Consider that there is not one word of law in existence to-day obligating Congress to take care of and treat the boys after they return, the fact yet remains that there is an obligation on us greater and more binding than mere law can make it. It is an obligation springing from reciprocal duty. These boys fought for our preservation and for the preservation of liberty in this great Republic and in the world, and we must take care of them, not solely because we promised to do it but because in itself it is right to do it. [Applause.]

Gentlemen argue that among the various activities of the Public Health Service it would use the hospitals here provided for in caring for and administering to the needs of men who did not fight on the firing line in France; and the gentleman who has just taken his seat, my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER], for whom I have a great deal of respect and personal affection, says that the hospitals will be filled with boys passed by the legal draft board but who never entered the service except in that formal way. The gentleman quotes from page 34 of the hearings, in which an eminent surgeon testified—and a splendid surgeon he is, too, but he is not much of a lawyer, because in his testimony before the committee he so misquoted or misstated the law as to mislead the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER]. Quoting from testimony of this surgeon, the gentleman read as follows:

> The above-named officer, commissioned officer, or enlisted man shall have been held to have been in sound condition when inducted into the service.

That is not the law, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] ever becomes interested in legal questions in a vital way I will suggest to him to consult a lawyer and not a doctor. Let me read the law:

> That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided; but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct: Provided, That for the purposes of this section said officer, enlisted man, or other member shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service: Provided further, That this section as amended shall be deemed to become effective as of October 6, 1917.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, what the status of these men is? What was their status in the service?

Mr. RUCKER. For many purposes after he passed the draft board he became a soldier and was in the service, necessarily so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Under the law.

Mr. RUCKER. Under the law. He was amenable to punishment for desertion or any military offense. But for the purposes of this law Congress had the foresight and wisdom to say that for the purposes of this law—that is, the law providing for compensation—a man shall be considered in sound condition after he shall have been examined, accepted, and enrolled for service. When accepted—by whom? By the medical authorities at the camp and enrolled into the service of his country, and not until then. I can not discuss that any longer, but let me say that I for one will join hands with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] if the law we passed is as absurd as the doctor said it was, and as the gentleman argued it is by his remarks, and assist him to amend it. Who wants to build hospitals for men who were afflicted with disease, mental or physical, at the time of passing the draft board and who for those reasons were unfit for military service, and therefore were sent back to their homes without being accepted and enrolled for service? Who wants to build hospitals for them? Nobody. On the other hand, when the boys are taken from their homes, from their fathers and mothers, from their wives and children, and put into the camps, accepted by the military authorities, enrolled for duty, and subsequently were discharged because of infirmities and afflictions of service origin, then our duty arises and we should act. It ill behooves any man here to question the right or wisdom of making provision for such men.

I sincerely hope this bill will pass, as it ought to pass. Let us give relief to these boys who are coming back maimed, wounded, and impaired in health.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUCKER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time we have upon this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes and the other side has 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I have reserved those 10 minutes for the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], chairman of the committee, and I will ask the other side to use their time now.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call to the attention of the committee what I understand to be the intent of this bill. First, I understand it to be to secure a $10,000,000 appropriation for the purpose of providing hospital treatment for those who were sent to the Army camps and who, after examination in the Army camps by the medical officers, were returned as unfit for service. In other words, Mr. Chairman, only those men who through negligence or inattention or oversight of the draft board were sent to these camps and whom the officers in the camp found were not fit for military service, because of disabilities, are to be cared for by this bill. This bill is intended to take care of that one class.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I can not yield until I have made my statement. Mr. Chairman, if there is a considerable number of men in this country who were drafted into the service and found unfit for service in a few weeks after they got to the camps by the medical officers, then there is every opportunity in every State in this land for their treatment. There are in my State and in my city hospitals for the treatment of men afflicted with tubercular diseases or with any other trouble. That is one class. It has been stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], who so ably presented the case on the part of the committee, that it is also provided that this bill shall affect and take care of men who were discharged from the service, who had been in the Army for some length of time, who probably contracted tuberculosis or other diseases in France or in the camps of this country. This morning I talked with the Surgeon General's office, and Col. Smith told me they have three large tubercular hospitals in this country that are not by any means filled. Not only that, but he told me this morning that the Surgeon General of the Army had to-day sent a letter to the Secretary of War asking the Secretary of War to ask Congress for authority to readmit to the hospitals of this country soldiers who have been discharged and are found afterwards to need medical treatment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not true that to-day, under the Overman bill, the President could make an order of that kind if he desired?

Mr. DYER. He could if he was here and knew the situation and condition in this country.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. No; I have only five minutes, and I trust the gentleman will not interrupt me until I have had an opportunity to make my statement. What other justification is there for this $10,000,000 appropriation. The marine hospitals of this country do not need all their beds for the treatment of patients that they are now authorized under the law to take care of. I have in my city of St. Louis a marine hospital that to-day is not nearly filled, not over two-thirds, at the most, of its beds are filled now or have been filled for many years.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I can not at this time.

Mr. RUCKER. Then, I will answer the gentleman in a few minutes in my own time, and I will ask the gentleman then if he wants to put the interest and welfare of the property holders of St. Louis above the boys who have been fighting.

Mr. DYER. That is not a question pertinent to what I said. The marine hospital in St. Louis, owned by the United States, has been admitting men who were in the service in this war. Men have gone there from the camps located near St. Louis, men wearing the uniform of the service, and this hospital has had room to take care of them.

Here is the proposition, pure and simple. It is a question of whether or not the men who have been wounded in fighting the battles of our country, men who have contracted this dreadful disease—tuberculosis—whether those men, men whom we see in the Walter Reed Hospital—and I wish every Member of Congress would go there and see the patients in that hospital——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me a minute more in order to conclude my sentence.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DYER. Shall receive the best treatment possible. We ought not to permit the Public Health Service to take over for treatment men who have fought the battles of this Republic. The War Department ought to do that. It ought to be under the Surgeon General of the Army, who has looked after these men since they left home, who should continue to look after these men as long as they live, whether they are in the service or have been discharged. Surg. Gen. Ireland to-day has written a letter to the Secretary of War, asking the Secretary of War to go to Congress and ask Congress for authority to readmit men to the hospitals who have been discharged for one reason or another and are in need of treatment. In the tuberculosis hospital—a general hospital—in Fort Bayard Hospital they have been admitting patients all of the time, men who have been discharged from the service. You can get a man in there who has served in the Philippines if he has tuberculosis. There is no excuse for asking for an appropriation of this kind. It is an injustice to the men who have fought the battles of this war and who have won it. The Secretary of War is responsible, through the Surgeon General. He has been given ample funds. Let us give him the authority he still needs to care for soldiers discharged.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think that every Member of this House and everybody in America wants to do everything that is necessary or proper to take care of the men who fought the battles for this country and saved us from the galling yoke of autocracy, but we must proceed in this business in an orderly manner. After more than 50 years have elapsed we are still taking care of the veterans of the Civil War, and we will have to take care of them for some years yet, although I notice in this morning's paper that one-tenth of the veterans of the Civil War who were left had died during this last year. This proposition which we have before us is not for the purpose of building hospitals to take care of soldiers who are in the Army. The Army now has enough hospitals to take care of them, but this is a proposition to take care of those men after their discharge from the Army. There will have to be a comprehensive plan adopted, gentlemen, to take care of the wounded and sick men of this war. We will have to adopt an adequate system of pensions, we will have to build adequate soldiers' homes to take care of these boys who have not homes of their own in which they can be taken care of, and that is the reason why I am objecting to this bill as it is now presented. It is simply a makeshift measure. The Public Health Service and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance do not know whether they are traveling afoot or on horseback. They come in here and ask for an appropriation of $10,500,000 to take care of a proposition that eventually may take $50,000,000 or $100,000,000. Whatever it takes I am for it, but I am not for this bill, because it does not offer any comprehensive plan for taking care of these men in a way on which we can depend. I, for one, am getting tired of having men come before me and ask my vote for an appropriation of $1,000,000, $10,000,000, $50,000,000, or $100,000,000 and not give an adequate reason or give a comprehensive plan for its expenditure, one upon which we can go back to the taxpayers of this country and receive their indorsement. We are just about to engage upon a system of expenditures in this country that is going to appall the taxpayers of the country. They are willing to do everything that is necessary to take care of these boys and to do it right, but they are going to demand of this Congress, of the War Department, and of the various bureaus of this Government, that we get down to a basis of common, ordinary economy and do these things right, so that when we spend a dollar for the benefit of these boys they are going to get the benefit of that dollar.

Now, another thing I object to is this. This matter comes down to this, the turning over to the Public Health Service in conjunction with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance of the treatment of these soldiers. I have said nothing on the floor of this House heretofore in regard to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, but I wish to say this: I have had considerable experience with this Bureau of War Risk Insurance and I want to say this to you, gentlemen, that if the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would not do any better job in taking care of these wounded and sick soldiers than they have in taking care of the allotments which the soldiers have made to their wives and dependents, God help the poor fellow who had to depend upon them for treatment. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; I have not any time to yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I hope the gentleman will be good enough to yield to allow me to correct a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. The time was taken up by the gentleman from New York interrupting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman had expired when the gentleman from New York interrupted him.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, there has been more camouflage about this bill than any bill which I have seen before the House for a long time. Now, it is well enough after all of these attempts which have been made to becloud the issue to come right down to the point and let us see what the facts are. The facts are, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, under the law when a man is discharged from the service—a soldier or a sailor—he can not after that be treated in a hospital under the jurisdiction of the War Department. That is the law and there is no question about it. In the next place, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under this bill, if gentlemen are so much afraid of that bureau, will not have a thing on earth to do with the treatment of these soldiers. The bill turns this over entirely to the Public Health Service and not the War Risk Bureau. Now, Mr. Chairman, we want to get down to the facts; why the necessity for this bill; and I want to read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, for 20 years a distinguished Member of this body, and I hope gentlemen will listen to what he says. This letter was written January 16 and addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, asking for a rule to consider this bill:

JANUARY 16, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Rules,
United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POU: I wish to invite your attention to the very urgent need of providing additional hospital facilities for the care and treatment of patients of the Public Health Service and for discharged soldiers and sailors who are beneficiaries of the war-risk insurance, for which the Treasury Department is charged by law with the responsibility of providing hospital accommodations and treatment.

The present total normal bed capacity of hospitals under the control of this department is but 1,548, while on November 20 there were actually 1,556 patients in its hospitals. Indeed, it has been necessary for many months to crowd our hospitals to the limit of their capacity by placing additional beds in undesirable places and to refuse admission to many who are entitled to treatment in our hospitals. This department also has the names and addresses of upward of 50,000 other cases entitled under law to receive treatment, for which there are absolutely no hospital accommodations.

Now, these gentlemen want something "comprehensive." Here it is. That word seems to rest upon their tongues like a sweet morsel—"something comprehensive"—

A comprehensive and carefully worked out scheme of additional hospital accommodations, much of which will be of a more permanent nature and affording a permanent groundwork for the hospitalization of persons entitled to treatment by this department, is provided for in a bill which has been given number H. R. 13026, now awaiting action by the House of Representatives.

It is reasonable to presume from the location of this bill on the House Calendar that consideration of it will not be reached for a very considerable time, possibly not this session, and as the most urgent need of these additional accommodations is for the benefit of discharged soldiers and sailors who require and are entitled to hospital treatment, it is of vital interest to every section of the Nation that the Government may be put in position to promptly carry out its contract in this respect, as expressed in the amended act of October 6, 1917, and prior legislation.

May I not suggest and urge that a special rule be brought by your committee for the immediate consideration of this bill as reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on December 21, a copy of which is hereto attached?

Respectfully, (Signed) CARTER GLASS,
Secretary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that does not set forth the urgency of this proposition, the facts showing the absolute need of it, nothing can. But what are the facts in the hearings? Gentlemen quoted Col. Smith, of the Surgeon General's office, War Department. One gentleman says we have got all sorts of propositions that can be taken care of, and every time it is procrastination, it is delay. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that on yesterday I talked with a soldier in Walter Reed Hospital. It is crowded down there, and it is not a place where these boys ought to be, if the statements made in the public press and which he repeated to me are true; and yet we are standing around here wanting to wait six months or a year to begin work on hospitals. The sooner we begin, the earlier we will take care of these boys; and we ought to take care of them. We are under a solemn legislative contract to do it, and yet gentlemen say, "If it is not done my way, I do not propose to have it done at all."

Now, then, what are the facts? Dr. Stimpson, the Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service—on page 46, I think it is, of the hearings, or in the beginning of the first hearing—said that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance asked to place their patients in Public Health Service hospitals; that this was done and our hospitals are full. "We have not any rooms at all for more patients. The War Risk Bureau asked us to take care of 14,000 tubercular patients. We took the matter up with the Secretary of the Treasury, who asked us to see the War Department." They did, and there was a conference, of which my colleague spoke, of the three departments—the Navy, the War, and the Public Health Service—and they agreed upon the plan embodied in this bill to take care of them. In a letter from the Acting Surgeon General the War Department says:

The Army has no provision for treating the above class of patients.

And yet gentlemen say we should put them in the Army hospitals. Dr. Banks, the chief surgeon of the War Risk Bureau, said, on page 46:

Something must be done * * * because these men are being discharged now at the rate of five to the thousand for tuberculosis.

Now, what did Col. Smith say? I want to call the attention of this House to the fact, and the hearings show it, that Col. Smith was before the committee representing the Surgeon General's office of the War Department, and I put the question to him time after time:

Colonel, if the War Department has any hospitals that can be turned over to the Public Health Service, tell us about them, because we want to use them.

And every time he said, "Now we can not turn over a single bed for the use of the Public Health Service."

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have not the time.

He finally did say that he could turn over a hospital at Hot Springs, N. C., and one at some other place; "but," he said, "they are the least desirable of any that we have." And gentlemen will say that these "least desirable" hospitals are good enough for the boys who fought at Chateau-Thierry and who went into the Argonne Forest. Then what are we to understand? He said that those were the two least desirable hospitals that they have, "those that do not suit us and will not suit anybody, but we will turn them over to you, because we can not use them." And yet gentlemen say that we ought to take that kind of treatment for our brave sons who followed the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I have not the time. He said this:

By the acquisition of buildings by lease and the transfer by the War Department to the Medical Department at various posts of the Army others have been acquired for general hospital purposes up to 37.

I have not time to read it all, but the hearings show that the United States Government does not own more than four general permanent hospitals in the world to-day. They have 37, but they do not own them. They are leased and they are used in one way and another. And the record from the War Department shows that they do not own but four under the shining sun of heaven anywhere to-day. However, they have leased some hotels and they have some cantonments here and there and have places like that. But Col. Smith stated before us that there were 52,000 vacant beds at that time. He was asked, "How many can you turn over to us?" "Not one, because we are saving them as a margin of safety for the soldiers, wounded and sick, coming from across the sea." And he would not give a single, solitary one to the Public Health Service. And yet, Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen say, "Put it off until a more convenient season."

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that we are under a solemn contract with these boys who have saved democracy for the peoples of the earth and saved this Government, and it is cowardly on our part and it is a violation of our contract not to take every step possible to provide every accommodation for them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatement of discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service by lease or purchase of existing plants or the construction of new hospitals and sanatoria, to include the necessary buildings, with their appropriate mechanical equipment and approach work, including roads leading thereto, for the accommodation of patients, officers, nurses, attendants, storage, laundries, and live stock, on sites now owned by the Government, or on new sites to be acquired by purchase or otherwise at such places as he may elect, including the remodeling of such of the existing or authorized buildings and their equipment, owned by the United States, as may be necessary to economically adapt such facilities to those herein provided, at the sanatorium at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., and at such of the marine hospitals where increased facilities can be placed, at a limit of cost for sites and buildings, etc., as aforesaid, complete, $9,700,000, or as much thereof as may be found necessary; for miscellaneous furniture and equipment for the above, $800,000; in all, $10,500,000, and the above amounts are hereby authorized, and when appropriated to be immediately available and remain available until expended.

Mr. MANN and Mr. GANDY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman withhold it for a moment and let us dispose of a committee amendment?

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is a committee amendment. The gentleman withholds his amendment until we can dispose of the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 5, strike out "treatement" and insert in lieu thereof the word "treatment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 1, line 6, after the word "soldiers," strike out the word "and" and insert after the word "sailors" the words "and marines."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We will accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I assume there is no objection to the amendment which I have offered in order to correct the language.

I have had a good deal of doubt about this bill, and I would like to discuss it for a few minutes with the Members of the House. As I understand the law, the War Department is not authorized under existing law to admit discharged soldiers into the Army hospitals. Of course, the Army is not authorized to admit discharged sailors into the Army hospitals. So that some law, it seems to me, ought to be enacted. We either ought to provide that the discharged men shall be eligible for admission into the hospitals now in existence or being created under the Army, so that they can be taken care of after their discharge in accordance with the practical pledge provided in the war-risk insurance law and in accordance with the sentiment both of Congress and the country, or else we ought to make other provisions separate and apart from the Army for taking care of the discharged soldiers.

It has been stated here that the Army was loath to discharge men now in the hospitals. I suppose other Members of Congress have had the same sort of complaints that I have had from men in the hospitals—that they could not get discharges from the hospitals and go home. I can appreciate the desire of the soldier to go home from a hospital, and also the desire of the Army to keep him in the hospital as long as it is to his advantage to stay there. Some legislation, it seems, is needed, either to provide a method by which discharged soldiers can be taken care of in the Army hospitals or out of the Army hospitals, and it will not do, it seems to me, for Congress to get into the position where it is contesting between the two propositions and then do nothing. [Applause.] It would be a disgrace to Congress if we were unable to determine which horn of the dilemma we would take. It is our duty to do things, to enact legislation.

Now, it is suggested that the Army has sufficient hospital facilities, either in existence or in process of erection, to provide for all hospitals required. I do not know what the facts may be as to that; no one knows. The Surgeon General's office does not know, because it is finitely impossible for anybody now to tell how much disease there will be among the boys when they have come home which requires hospital facilities. But we had better go a little over the limit than to be away beneath the limit in the way of hospital facilities for the boys who are in the service.

Now, I find that gentlemen have been urging, first, that we employ the hospital facilities now in the Army. That could be done, I suppose, by a provision of law authorizing or requiring the admission of discharged soldiers. That, then, brings up first the question as to whether it is desirable as a permanent policy to say that the Army shall have control over the soldiers' homes, whether you call them homes or hospitals, of discharged soldiers and sailors. That is an old, old contest. We now have soldiers' homes throughout the country, to a large extent the same as hospitals, not under the control of the Army. The Army has the duty of inspecting the soldiers' homes, but Congress long ago, whether wisely or unwisely, determined to take away the control of the discharged Civil War soldiers from the Army. In other words, I take it that it was the opinion of Members of Congress, and probably the opinion of the country at the time, that it was not advisable to put these old soldiers, in ill health or otherwise grouchy and disgruntled in various ways and at various times, under the strict Army discipline. I suspect that they have strict enough discipline in the soldiers' homes now to gall the soldiers without putting them under the strictest kind of Army discipline. Whatever may have been the theory of Congress, however, that was done.

Now, the contest is as to whether men who have been discharged and who have to be taken care of by the Government shall be taken care of in hospitals under the control of the Army or under the control of the Public Health Service. As to the Public Health Service, I was going to say it is a grasping body, but that is true of all Government functions. It is very rare that any bureau or department of the Government does not seek to increase its authority and jurisdiction rather than decrease it. There is that contest going on. I am inclined to think, while it is not such a very positive opinion in my mind, that the soldiers will receive better care and more humane treatment and be less subject to severe and onerous martial regulations under the Public Health Service than they would be under the Army direction and under Army discipline.

I find this provision in this bill as an amendment, and I would be very glad to have information concerning it. We have had a good deal said in the House here—well said, appropriately said—about the Government having facilities already. This bill authorizes——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. This bill authorizes in its first paragraph a limit of cost of $10,500,000 for the acquirement and equipment of these hospital facilities under the Public Health Service. That is the total limit. What it will cost in the end, of course, no one can tell, but that is all the authorization provided in this bill. Then, I read an amendment of the committee, which, so far as I know, is to be offered and voted upon:

Provided, That nothing shall be expended out of the amounts authorized by this act until all buildings, grounds, furniture, and furnishings available for hospital purposes not needed by the said departments or officers of the Government hereinbefore mentioned have been turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, the departments mentioned are the War, Navy, Interior, and Labor Departments, and possibly others, under the control of the President, so that apparently the bill provides, first, an authorization of $10,500,000 for hospital facilities and then makes a provision that if, however, the Government now has any hospital facilities in the Army or under the Interior Department or under the Navy Department that are not required for use in that department they shall be turned over to the Public Health Service, and no money can be spent out of the amount authorized in this bill until somebody, I take it, certifies—the different heads of departments and the President—that there is nothing further under their control not needed in that particular department which can be turned over to the Government.

Now, if the War Department has additional hospital facilities which it does not require, under the terms of this bill it is required to turn those facilities over to the Public Health Service, and the same is true of any of the other departments of the Government; so that apparently, if this amendment stays in the bill, when it becomes a law there will be no duplication of unnecessary hospital facilities. I will not say that such a duplication will not occur, because that is an executive matter, but, so far as the legislative end of it is concerned, we have provided for no additional facilities.

Now, I think I shall vote for this bill. I have not fully determined in my mind yet. But this is certain to me: We have got to do something; we have to provide hospital facilities for these boys who have come home, who have received their discharges, who have gone to their homes ill, and soon will become unable to work, and there will be more of them 10 years from now than there are now. Time will increase the number. We can not say that while we quarrel whether we shall cross a "t" or dot an "i" they shall suffer. It is up to us to provide by legislation some method by which they will receive proper attention. [Applause.]

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has covered the ground so well that it is difficult to add to what he has said. However, there has been so much said, from so many different angles, that it has been more or less confusing to know just what this bill purposes to do and what the situation is.

Now, first of all, let me recall to the Members of this House that the war-risk insurance act provides that these discharged soldiers shall receive hospital treatment. So there is a burden on somebody connected with our Government to take care of these discharged soldiers by actual enactment of law. That is in section 302, subdivision 3, of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; I will read it, if I may have the time:

(3) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary.

The second proposition is that every man in this body wants these discharged soldiers to receive the best treatment that this Government can give them.

The third proposition is that we must make this provision with the utmost dispatch.

The fourth proposition is that we must do it with absolute certainty. When we leave this body on the 4th of March there must be no doubt that we have performed our full duty to those men in this respect.

Now, what is the situation? If you will take the trouble to read the testimony of Col. Smith, of the Surgeon General's Office, and the report which he submitted to the committee, you will find that Col. Smith, representing the Surgeon General's Office, can assure us of absolutely nothing for months to come, unless possibly it may be some leased buildings, which he himself describes as the least desirable of any of the hospitals that the War Department has.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will in just a minute. Let me read. The chairman of our committee at the committee hearings asked this question:

Can you state as a matter of fact, Col. Smith, that the Public Health Service can get any beds from the War Department within two years from now; and if so, how many? Let us get down to the facts.

Mr. RUCKER. Either at the cantonments or elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Anywhere that would be suitable for hospital purposes.

Col. SMITH. The only beds now used by the War Department which I could state as a matter of fact would probably be released and thus become available to the Public Health Service within the time mentioned would be beds located in buildings which have been leased by the Government for hospital purposes.

Mr. CANNON. On what page is that?

Mr. PHELAN. This is in the hearings, page 15 of No. 16. That is one of his statements.

Mr. DYER. Just there I want to ask——

Mr. PHELAN. In a moment. The gentleman would not yield to me, but I will yield to him in a few minutes. Now, on page 22 of that same document he makes a written report, to which he gave a great deal of thought and time, because we asked him a great many questions relative to this phase of the situation. In that report he says:

It is impossible to state at this time when any of the hospitals now operated by the Army could be released for use by the Public Health Service. While it is believed that we have provision for a sufficient number of beds in Army hospitals, it is also our belief that we require all that we now have in order to provide a reasonable margin of safety for the care of the sick and wounded returning from overseas and the sickness problem which may develop among the troops in this country and returning for demobilization. We could turn over at once, if approved by the War Department, a general hospital which is about to be opened at Hot Springs, N. C., namely, United States Army General Hospital No. 23, which has a capacity of approximately 700 beds. This is the only hospital which could be turned over immediately.

Then he goes on to speak of something which might be done relative to the leased hospitals.

While I am on this subject, suppose we turn again to the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes. I should like to go into this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman stated that in the hearings Col. Smith said there were no facilities which the War Department could turn over to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not mean to say that, and I am sure I did not say that. I said that Col. Smith said he could give us no assurance as to when they could turn over anything.

Mr. DYER. Now, the gentleman says that Col. Smith has asked from the Secretary of War authority to readmit and take into the hospitals that are now half empty a lot of these men——

Mr. PHELAN. That does not necessarily conflict with anything I said.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know what he has in contemplation. He may want more money. He may want more hospitals. He may want to do a number of things that are provided for in this bill.

Mr. DYER. But the hearings show that the hospitals are not built.

Mr. PHELAN. But we have his written statement, which he wrote after he had been interrogated in the committee hearings, and had gone to his office and had had time to think the thing over, and that statement is what I quoted last.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does he not think it is a better policy and in the interest of the taxpayers of the country to give the War Department authority to look after these cases in hospitals which will be practically no expense to the country than to create another set of hospitals under another jurisdiction?

Mr. PHELAN. I certainly do not, and I do not believe the American people in such a case will ever want to put civilians under military control. I make no criticism whatsoever of our Military Establishment when I say that; but I certainly am not in favor of that policy, when we can get proper accommodations for them elsewhere.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. How long will it take to construct the hospitals that you seek to authorize?

Mr. PHELAN. I can not answer that; but I will call the attention of the gentleman to the constant misapprehension in discussing this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] brought out the point.

The bill provides that these hospitals can be "acquired"—acquired, for example, from some other department of the Government—so that when the gentleman asks "How long will it take to construct them?" he gives the impression that they have all got to be constructed. They expect that they can construct them in about six months, but they do not have to wait for that; they can lease them or they can get them from other branches of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will correct me if I am wrong. In my judgment, this contemplates that the hospitals will take from 12 months to 3 years to build. Now, I am under the impression—not that I have seen them, but I think I am authorized to make the statement—that at the camps and cantonments there are now hospital beds under the control of the War Department for over 100,000 men; and if the gentleman will allow me, and I know he desires to be candid, as I do, that in the barracks, especially for most of the tuberculous treatment, there would be room for one hundred to two hundred thousand more, for all that class of patients that are treated by sunshine and air and proper food.

Mr. PHELAN. I am coming to that, I will say to the gentleman, and I think the gentleman will agree with me. I have a good deal to explain. If Members will look at page 25 of the hearings No. 16, they will see what the War Department has in the way of hospitals and will find that they have four permanent hospitals. Col. Smith stated that not one could be turned over to the Public Health Service at any time.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not?

Mr. PHELAN. Because the buildings were all constructed and existed before this war ever started. They were using them for the Army then, and if the buildings were, as we presume they are, only reasonably sufficient to take care of the Army purposes then, they will be needed to provide the Army purposes after the war is over. There are only four of them. You will find general hospitals at the Army posts. Yet Col. Smith stated that none of these would be available, and the reason is the same. The Army post hospitals all existed before the war, and every one of them will be needed after the war. They were used for the forces before the war started, and we can not expect that the War Department can get along without them after the war is over.

Now, in the minority report, when they are telling of the hospitals that can be acquired, you will find that every single building that they mention is a leased hospital, leased by the War Department, and owned—leased under the restriction that when the war ceases the department will have no authority to extend the lease beyond a very short time. More than that, the War Department has stated that if there are buildings that can be turned over to the Public Health Service, they will turn them over, and our bill provides that thing shall be done if it is advisable. So the plan mentioned in the minority report will be followed under this very bill to which the minority report objects if it is desirable and advantageous to do it. So that when they say that we have hospitals already they are confusing the issue, because every hospital that they name is made available as a leased hospital.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it not better to have the hospitals leased instead of being built, because they will not be needed after a few years?

Mr. PHELAN. That is only begging the question, because there is nothing in the bill to prevent that thing from being done. We specifically provide that the Public Health Service may lease buildings.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that the Public Health Service or any other department of the Government will avail itself of that provision?

Mr. PHELAN. I think the general tendency under the administrative branch of the Government, under any administration, under any political party, is to build rather than to lease. I will say this to the gentleman, however, to get down to the meat of the question, what are you going to do about it? What are gentlemen opposed to the bill proposing to do? They propose nothing. I will answer the gentleman's question further by reading the proviso:

Provided, That nothing shall be expended out of the amounts authorized by this act until all buildings, grounds, furniture, and furnishings available for hospital purposes not needed by the said departments or officers of the Government hereinbefore mentioned have been turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury.

While I do not think that is absolutely binding, that they must turn over leased buildings, I think it shows the intention of Congress, and has a strong tendency to induce any administrative department to avoid unnecessary construction.

But to get back to the facts, we have got to take care of these men. How are you going to do it? Are you going to leave here on the 4th of March with everything uncertain in the face of the Surgeon General's statement that he does not know where he can turn anything over to the service of discharged soldiers needing hospital treatment? The gentleman from Illinois stated that there is a contest between those who favor turning them over to the Public Health Service and those favoring turning them over to the military service. I will not deny that there is a contest, but do those favoring military department offer anything in a substantive form. We have got to do something and you can not allow this thing to be hung up in the air. We can not leave it uncertain that these men shall get proper care and medical service when discharged from the Army.

To resume my recapitulation of Army hospitals, in addition to general hospitals, Army post hospitals, and hospitals on leased land, there are some hospitals at the ports of embarkation which, I think, anybody will agree will be of doubtful value.

Outside of those, the only buildings under the control of the Surgeon General's Office are those at camps and cantonments. There is nothing else available except leased buildings, so that we come to this. If the War Department does turn over any hospitals to the Public Health Service, they must turn over those in leased buildings or those in camps or cantonments. If we fail to enact this bill, then the only hospitals available for discharged soldiers would be hospitals in leased buildings, possibly under the control of the War Department, and hospitals in cantonments and camps.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I shall object unless the gentleman will yield to me. I have asked him to do so two or three times.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall yield to the gentleman, although he would not yield to me, but that does not make any difference.

Mr. KREIDER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not know that he asked me to yield to him.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; I did.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman in a moment. So that we come right down to this: We would have to use those cantonment hospitals or hospitals in leased buildings. If we want to use leased buildings for hospitals, we are going to get the least desirable, and if we are going to use the cantonment hospitals, what do we get? We get, first of all, buildings that are not permanent in their construction; buildings that are not suitable immediately for this purpose; buildings that are not fireproof. Most of them are of wooden construction, one story in height. Some of them have no heating apparatus. While there is some testimony that they might be changed into permanent hospitals, there is no testimony that they can be made fireproof, and I say it would be a crime to put boys coming out of our Army, suffering from some disease that is incurable perhaps, into any buildings not fireproof in construction. I shall not vote for any such thing. We come then to this proposition: Are we going to take a chance that somebody somewhere, and there is no evidence where it is coming from in any of the testimony, will make provisions for these men who are discharged from our military and naval services? Are we going to take a chance that from some place we will get those accommodations, or are we going to take a chance that somebody will spend some money, possibly a little more than necessary, while making it absolutely sure that we will have proper quarters and accommodations in hospitals for the men who have been fighting for this country?

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman overlook the fact that all the testimony in the hearings is to the effect that these hospitals shall be built for tuberculosis patients?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not overlook it, because it is not so.

Mr. KREIDER. Yes, it is; if the gentleman will read the hearings and refer to them he will find that that is the actual fact.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not judge what a bill states by reading the hearings. I judge what a bill states by reading the bill. There is nothing in the bill, and it is not so contemplated, because we asked every man repeatedly coming before the committee about men suffering from Bright's disease and other incurable diseases.

Mr. KREIDER. And the answer was that they would be taken care of in the hospitals throughout the country.

Mr. PHELAN. I differ with the gentleman. This bill attempts to make certain that we are going to have provision for these boys and does not leave it in doubtful, not leave it in what seems to be the condition that no accommodations or at best not sufficient accommodations can possibly be provided for them otherwise. Which are we going to do? Are we going to take a chance that such a thing will occur? Suppose the Congress does not convene until next December, suppose hundreds, yes, thousands of these boys ought to be taken care of by some branch of the United States Government, and suppose there are no existing facilities available, suppose we give no authority to anybody to do anything, what a condition of affairs will confront us, at least until Congress reconvenes. To what a serious and indefensible charge of neglect do we leave ourselves open? There will be absolutely nobody who can do anything if we fail to do our duty here. It is as plain as can be to me, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so well stated, that something must be done, and that something must be done now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WOODYARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute, so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would like to get a vote upon my amendment and have it disposed of if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending on which there has been the usual discussion on each side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Adding the Marine Corps. The gentleman from Florida has called for a vote. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is exhausted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment, although I suppose it would be in order to offer that amendment later, and I shall reserve my right to offer an amendment later.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending, and I hope the gentleman will let us have that disposed of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to suggest that neither the amendment nor the bill includes Army nurses, female, nor does the bill include members of the Coast Guard who may have been disabled or injured during the war. I call attention to these facts to show how imperfect the bill is. I would seek by my amendment to include these two classes, and I shall do so just as soon as the opportunity arrives.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 1, line 8, after the word "service," insert a comma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, at the proper point I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, to insert "Army nurses, female, and members of the Coast Guard during the period of the war."

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman can accomplish his purpose by inserting the words "Army nurses," without regard to sex.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Male nurses would be included as "soldiers." "Army nurses, female," includes women who have been in the service and who may have been injured and need medical treatment. Some have been injured.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I had no opportunity to write it. The gentleman was in such haste to press his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Marines," in the Mann amendment, insert "Army nurses, females, and members of the Coast Guard during the period of the war."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that members of the United States Coast Guard Service are entitled to treatment under the Public Health Service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of such consequence that we have been obliged to include it in the revenue bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, if the gentleman will permit me to call his attention to the fact that the law now provides the following classes shall be treated in the Public Health Service: Merchant seamen, the Mississippi River Commission, the United States Coast Guard Service, the United States Lighthouse Service, the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, civilian employees injured under the workmen's compensation act, civilian employees injured on Army transports, and cases of discharged soldiers and sailors, under the war-risk insurance act of October 6, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That applies to any time, whether within the war period or without?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may refer to a man injured five years from now or one injured five years before the war?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Surely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take it that is not the purpose of this bill, to provide that injuries not due to the war——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why, Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentlemen this bill is simply to provide for the building of hospitals to take care of all those people who are entitled to treatment at the hands of the Public Health Service under existing law, and in lines 7 and 8 the gentleman will see——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand a member of the Coast Guard ordinarily would be treated by the Marine Hospital Service, or a sailor upon a merchantman, provided he were properly qualified, but I take it this is a war act, that the gentlemen who are advocating this——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; it is an after-the-war act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). Are urging the passage on the ground of the necessity of taking care of the soldiers who were injured on the other side of the water and who are coming home——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And who have been discharged.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now it is proposed to expand the service of the Marine Hospital so that under this appropriation any old thing can take place at any time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no; it is not, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me; we have a statute declaring that each of these classes of people shall be entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service. That is existing law to-day. Congress has enacted those laws and Congress is under obligation to provide hospitals necessary to treat these people. Now, here comes another class of people, to wit, discharged soldiers, marines, and sailors, whom the War Department, through the Army hospitals, will not treat. They can not under the law, so hospitals have to be provided, and in providing for them the bill simply states these hospitals should be built for the treatment of persons entitled to treatment under the Public Health Service, and the Public Health Service will divide these people out into the different hospitals according to their classes, I assume, as they are entitled to be treated. Now, if the gentleman is really in earnest and wants to get his amendment in to take care of the nurses I think there is no objection to it. I think if they are injured in any way or become sick in the service, that after they have been discharged they would be entitled to it now under the operation of the law. The law makes no distinction as to sex. The gentleman ought to know that where "he" is used it includes "she" in every statute that ever was enacted in this country, but if the gentleman thinks it is necessary to provide particularly for female nurses——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as follows: Insert after the word "marines," where it appears in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the words "Army and Navy nurses."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman, because it does not specifically include females. Male is already covered by existing law, but female is not, as I understand it.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to its being included. It is my purpose, I will say to the gentleman, to include the Army and Navy nurses, whether they be male or female. I think they are probably included in the law, and I think this language does include them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARD offers a substitute amendment to the amendment of Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: After the word "marines," in the Mann amendment, insert "Army and Navy nurses."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We will accept the substitute.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I beg to offer an amendment as a substitute that will meet all these difficulties that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is trying to meet, and that is to add to the substitute the words "male or female."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would accept that amendment.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to that. I would suggest, also, as brought to my attention by a member of the committee, that after the word "all" insert "Army and Navy nurses, male or female."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Ohio accept the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am satisfied to accept it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to say a word about it. I want to ask these gentlemen a question. I know the gentleman at my left, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], is a lawyer, the gentleman at my right, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I believe, is not a lawyer. I want to know if these gentlemen seriously insist that the language "Army and Navy nurses" would not cover "male and female" nurses? Do they seriously insist on this proposition on this floor of the American Congress in this day of progress and civilization?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that the same question has been raised in a conference now being held on a great revenue bill, as to including female nurses who have been injured in the war on the other side, some of whom are coming back on crutches.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman seriously insist that the word "female" ought to go in?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman frankly that I am not in favor of the bill as reported.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman is not going to support the bill anyhow?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I expect to oppose the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So the gentleman is a Greek bearing gifts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily. I thought if this bill was going through and the gentleman has sufficient votes to pass it or rush it through without care and consideration being given to it I would try to perfect it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman is not trying to perfect it by this amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the amendment is highly proper. I would dislike to see the female nurses who labored in the war on the other side excluded from this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] to amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the vote is being taken. I think the Chair should separate the question. I suggest it is debatable.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is not debatable while the motion is being put, and I think that all debate has been exhausted on the proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Chair stated the question, and I rose to express myself.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman has been standing all the time. He has not taken his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. You can not do it while the vote is being taken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the vote had been taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is entitled to our consideration and respect in matters of this kind, but it is easily persuaded to bring in these housing, ground-purchasing, building-constructing measures. It abandoned its purpose to bring in an omnibus bill for reasons which I do not clearly understand, but brings in one that threatens danger in the matter of the use and possible waste of public money. It proposes to bring in other special bills of this kind, some of which may tend to appall the House, and for that reason I rise and state why, in my judgment, this bill ought to go back to the committee in order that the House may have an opportunity to more carefully consider this very important question of taking care of our injured and sick soldiers.

The boys who are coming back from Europe, those who are being unnecessarily detained over there now, as many of us believe, those who are in the camps and who can not get home to obtain the employment that awaits them, are the very boys that are going to pay for this ground and these buildings that we make appropriations for so lavishly. I am hearing from the employers of these boys now, and from many of the boys themselves, with respect to the expenditures the Government is authorizing for what is believed to be needless purposes. The great tax measure, which must come into the House very soon for approval by this body and another, is being objected to by the substantial men of the United States because it is going to deprive them, they contend, of the opportunity to employ such agencies as they can to give employment to these returning soldiers.

I want to care for the sick. I will go as far as any man in this House to vote the sums requisite for the care of our soldiers. I will go further and help to get them employment, which I am mighty anxious they shall have on their return to the United States, and from which they are being held now in order that this Government may keep its deals with other Governments, about which we in Congress know very little. But I do not believe that in this unfinished, lackadaisical way we should delegate to one bureau or another the power not only to appropriate $10,000,000 specifically, but the power to buy land, grounds, buildings anywhere that a bureaucrat desires to purchase, operate, on the pretense that we are doing it to help the returning soldiers.

This bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to purchase existing buildings, grounds, and equipment. Why, we have been doing nothing but purchasing grounds ever since this war began. We wasted $640,000,000 on aircraft that never gave our boys on the other side a look-in in the matter of aviation, except as we borrowed or bought the machines of foreign nations. The minority report in this particular instance shows that we have hospital facilities now for all the returning soldiers who need hospital attention. But a bureau steps in and asks for power to buy more ground and build more buildings, when we have spent $50,000,000 for housing——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This very Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds came in during the war with housing bills for the Department of Labor, and the result——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman can help me get five minutes more, I will agree to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will try to get the gentleman five minutes more. Can the gentleman inform the House where in the hearings it is stated that there is ample hospital accommodations for these soldiers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Take the minority report.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No. Will the gentleman point out in the hearings where it is shown that there is ample hospital accommodation for discharged soldiers and sailors? If the gentleman can do that, then I am willing to withdraw the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am willing to take the word of four Members of Congress, two Republicans and two Democrats, who in their minority report show that we have ample hospital facilities.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] tells me that he did not authorize his name to be signed to the minority report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I observe that there are signed to this minority report the names of AARON S. KREIDER, of Pennsylvania, R. N. ELLIOTT, of Indiana, H. A. BARNHART, of Indiana, and J. J. MANSFIELD, of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KREIDER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the statements in the report regarding hospitals and vacant beds are taken from the hearings, and were taken from them verbatim. I copied them myself, and they are printed exactly as they appeared in the hearings.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take the gentleman's word.

Mr. KREIDER. I further wish to say that Col. Smith in his testimony, in Document No. 14, states clearly, in reply to the question asked by the chairman of the committee covering two statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] on the floor of the House, that there are over 50,000 vacant beds; and I would suggest that the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the committee, in the statement he made this morning regarding the Secretary of the Treasury, reports having received a letter in which Mr. Secretary Glass refers to 50,000 patients. I want to suggest that this morning the Surgeon General's office reports about 45,000 beds now vacant and 15,000 more to be about completed; in all, 60,000 vacant beds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; 60,000 vacant beds to accommodate 50,000 patients——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In the same statement in which Col. Smith stated that, he stated that the Army needed every one of them. The minority report takes a part of the testimony and leaves out the rest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I always yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want also to call attention to the fact that if the gentlemen on the other side got any such information from Col. Smith or from the Surgeon General's office it is a deliberate and absolute contradiction of the letter from Col. Willford H. Smith, of the Surgeon General's office, addressed to me and printed as Exhibit D, on page 2056, of the RECORD of Saturday, printed as an exhibit to my remarks, in which Col. Smith said——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will pardon me. I can not yield unless I have more time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will ask that the gentleman have more time, if it is necessary, to get through. He says, "Total number of beds now vacant, 42,530." That was the condition on January 17, 1919.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is substantially what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] stated. The armistice was signed November 11, 1918. December 11 would be one month, January 11 would be two months, and we are now in the third month, and approaching the end of it, since the armistice was signed; and if we have a vast number of injured on the other side we ought to be informed of it by this time. If it is necessary to go into these new expenditures I am ready to do it, but there is no information, so far as I can gather, that we are now beyond hospital capacity for every boy who needs hospital attention.

Now, since the gentleman has put his figures into the RECORD in this short speech of mine, I will put in the RECORD the figures that the minority of the committee give me, using only the grand totals. Here is a long list of hospitals, general hospitals, camp base hospitals, and hospitals under the direction of the Surgeon General at the ports of embarkation at Hoboken, at Newport News, and large department base hospitals. All these show, according to the minority report, a standard capacity of 98,293, or substantially 100,000 beds—occupied but 59,628 and vacant 52,598. Now, will some gentleman who knows tell me how many men are to be accommodated at the present time? Do we need to spend this additional $10,000,000 and start a still greater expenditure?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In a moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] told me he called upon the War Department this morning and found that 45,000 beds are now vacant. If that is true the minority report is not deceptive, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania says his figures are taken from the hearings. They have 52,598 beds to accommodate 45,000 patients. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The thought I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania here to elaborate on is that the accommodations sought to be created by the authority of this bill are not intended for the use of soldiers at all, but are intended for the use of men who get out of the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is what the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] admitted in his statement a little while ago. That is what the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] admitted in his discussion with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on Saturday, that these hospitals were to become substantially a permanent institution, to give extended jurisdiction to the Public Health Service to take care of everybody, at any time, without regard to the war.

Mr. MADDEN. Not soldiers, but civilians.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Civilians; that is true. That is the argument, as I understood it. I want to care for these returning soldiers. I want to take care of them until we can put them on their feet to get employment again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am going to object. The gentleman has had 20 minutes already, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have had 10 minutes, and nearly all of that was taken up by the gentlemen on that side.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think the gentleman has had his time extended twice.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is so important a matter that there ought to be a quorum present.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think so, too, and I am going to insist that they stay here until we finish this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. KEARNS. Has the Chair counted to ascertain whether there is a quorum present or not?

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it too late to ask for tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair has announced that there is no quorum present, and there was no quorum present when the Chair made the announcement, and he directed the Clerk to call the roll. It is evident that there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 279 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. HARDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] had a pro forma amendment pending. The Chair assumes that that will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the committee, is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee, and I want to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. KREIDER. I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is a member of the committee. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama later.

Mr. KREIDER. I simply wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] to a statement in the hearings. I do not see the gentleman on the floor now. I propounded a question to him, in which he indicated that I was in error. I simply want to say that it is only an indication of how short men's memories are. The question was to the diseases with which these soldiers are afflicted. I read from hearing No. 14, page 34. The question was asked by the chairman of the committee:

Now, Doctor, tell me this: What are these hospitals for?

Dr. BANKS. For soldiers and sailors discharged from the military and naval service of the United States on account of disabilities incurred in line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Suffering from any disease?

Dr. BANKS. No; especially tuberculosis, for the reason that the large problem of discharged soldiers is tuberculosis. About 25 per cent of those discharged are suffering from that disease.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many?

Dr. BANKS. About 25 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you have got 75 per cent who are suffering from other troubles?

This was the question denied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], who said I was in error.

Dr. BANKS. Yes; of general miscellaneous character, either injuries or organic diseases, like heart disease, kidney disease, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand; but why do you say that all of these are to be especially for tubercular people, when only 25 per cent of them are tubercular?

Dr. BANKS. Because they require longer hospitalization than any other class.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but you have got to have conveniences to take care of the other classes.

Dr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you will need more room for the other classes than you will need for the tubercular people?

Dr. BANKS. Well, it is considered desirable to segregate that class.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I say, but the fact is you need more space?

Dr. BANKS. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. For others than you will need for the tubercular ones.

Dr. BANKS. Well, I doubt it, because——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Well, if there is 75 per cent of them, you certainly will.

Dr. BANKS. Well, they are of a class that can be treated at their homes, such as kidney disease and heart disease.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't mean that the Government is going to treat them at their homes?

Dr. BANKS. The Government is obligated to do it in one way or another.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean for them to have their own physicians?

Dr. BANKS. To have their own physicians.

The CHAIRMAN. To have local physicians?

Dr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I didn't catch that.

Dr. BANKS. They are to have their local physicians.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is your idea that the Government will employ local physicians all over the country to treat these people?

Dr. BANKS. They will have to do it, because these men will be located all over the United States in small villages and out-of-the-way places.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let us go a little slow here. I want to get as clear an understanding as a layman may get of this thing. It may sound very foolish to you, some of these questions, but nevertheless you are not talking to a group of doctors now, you know.

What would you say would be the proportion of space to be provided for those patients suffering from diseases that are not tubercular who will go to hospitals? Leave out the home treatment.

Dr. BANKS. Well, in the first place you have got to consider the tuberculosis situation. There are at present about 14,000 beds.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to cut that out and listen to the other for a minute or so.

Dr. BANKS. I wanted to say, as a basis for my statement, there are 14,000 beds throughout the United States for tuberculosis—that is, in hospitals especially devoted to tuberculosis. We have already got between 14,000 and 15,000 discharged. That is not taking into account these sanitoria which are already filled with civilian population. Consequently we have got to provide for this 14,000 elsewhere than in existing sanatoria. Now, the general hospitals of the United States are much more numerous than tuberculosis hospitals. I don't know the bed space of the general hospitals throughout the United States, but it is not adequate to take care of all these special diseases. For instance, we have nearly 4,000 discharges for epilepsy from the Army.

I refer to these matters to show that the proponents of this bill are not arguing in accordance with the testimony of men who appeared before the committee. It is not for the benefit of the returned soldiers. The chairman asked the question in plain language, "Now, Doctor, tell us what these hospitals are for," and he tells plainly what they are for in as plain language as a man can speak. Now, I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I shall have to object.

Mr. KREIDER I only want five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will not object at this time provided the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] can have a little more time.

Mr. KREIDER. I shall not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KREIDER. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman says that these hospitals are not for people in the Army. Did not they all state that there were 14,000 tubercular patients who had been discharged from the Army, and that they looked for 20,000 more?

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman knows that those were not men coming from France, men who had been over the sea. Not one of them came from the other side.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KREIDER. Here we have the proposition as to who are the patients. I call your attention to the question which the chairman asked, what are the hospitals for, and the answer that they are for the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Now, who are these men? I want to answer that by reading from the hearings, page 32:

Dr. BANKS. These men have been drafted into the Army by the Government; they have been taken away from their occupations and their previous methods of existence, you might say, involuntarily. They have been taken by process of law, and they have made no representations regarding physical conditions, and the Government took them as they stood. That is the equity of the case from their standpoint.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, if they are examined the next week, even, by the surgeon at the camps and turned down, they are entitled to compensation from the War Risk Insurance Board?

Dr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Although they have never seen any service and haven't been from their homes over perhaps a week or two?

Dr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is an outrage.

Mr. BURNETT. You say we passed a law to that effect, or is that merely a construction?

Dr. BANKS. No, sir; that is a law of Congress.

Mr. BURNETT. Then we are responsible for it?

Dr. BANKS. Not only that, but Congress amended the law to make that possible. It was not asked for by the War Risk Insurance Board.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Well, we are a set of chumps, then.

Mr. RUCKER. As a matter of fact, if I may put in a word, I think that is right.

[Laughter.]

Now, I want to make these two points clear as to who are the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, what are the hospitals intended for, and I want to say emphatically, according to the evidence I have read, that they are not for the returned soldiers over the sea. Those men are taken care of by the War Department, and they are on record as saying that they will not discharge them as long as they need hospital treatment. Now, there is a sinister reason back of all this. There is not a Member of Congress who desires to deprive a soldier of any benefit and accommodations he needs, or who desires not to do the thing for the soldier, but we can not afford to close our eyes to unnecessary expenditures of the public funds. I am in favor of the stipulation or the amendment written in the bill by the committee providing for the taking over of any hospitals, turning over patients from the War Department, and if that is done we need not expend $10,500,000. I would be perfectly willing to strike out the $10,000,000 and let the $500,000 stand.

I do think that there is a hospital needed at Norfolk, but I do not think we need to build these hospitals in 14 different cities in the United States for these purposes, because we now have all the hospital capacity that is necessary to take care of our soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the memory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] is very defective, indeed. When he comes to make his minority report he simply selects such parts of the testimony of Col. Smith as he thinks bear on his position in opposition to this bill and leaves out the important part of that testimony. I am going to call attention to it. The gentleman talks about the boys coming back from the other side. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says that they will have to pay part of this expense. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a soldier coming back from the other side but what will be willing to pay his part of the taxes which we will have to pay to care for or heal those that are discharged both from the other side and this side on account of disabilities for which this Government ought to take care of them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has referred to this, and I would like to know—and possibly the gentleman from Pennsylvania may know, because in a few weeks he will have an opportunity to vote on the question—whether he is willing for a crowd of aliens from the other side to be kept from these shores and kept from taking the jobs of returning soldiers from the trenches and camps. We will see how the gentleman stands when he gets a chance to vote on such a bill.

In regard to disabled men that have been inducted into the service under the draft, the incompetency, if there is any, is in the War Department and the men of those boards that have passed men as being physically satisfactory, and the same men have been returned from the camps by the Government surgeons. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the War Department we have incompetency in almost every detail. I want to read, because perhaps some gentlemen have not read it, an item from the Washington Star with reference to soldiers at the Walter Reed Hospital. Last Saturday this statement was made to the Star by some of the men, and if there was nothing more to get soldiers from under the control of the War Department which would impel me to vote for this bill this statement would.

I want to read just a few lines from it, to show how these soldier boys are treated—not by the hospital but by the War Department itself:

The regulations, one of the officers said, do not provide for the laundering by the Government, or at Government cost, of the clothes of the men who are able to attend to their own laundry. If the men find the work irksome all they need to do is to have their clothes sent to a city laundry and pay for the work in the regular way at the regular prices. Neither the quartermaster nor the adjutant has power to change a military regulation. The machine must operate in the usual way. Sentiment does not govern a military organization, he said.

As many of the men have not been paid for several months and are without funds, the question of their paying to have their laundry done is eliminated.

As a one-armed man yesterday was washing his shirt in the bathtub he remarked to a reporter he was sure that this great, rich country, for the safety of which he had in common with scores of thousands of others given his blood, did not desire that the crippled soldiers should do their own washing. A group of six or seven men, all leaning on crutches, each shorn of a leg, awaited their turn at the common clothes washing bathtub and good-naturedly urged him to "carry on."

"You see it's like this," said one of the men who had left his leg in France, "we must either do our own washing or not have it done at all. There is no laundry here for the use of the men. At least we haven't been able to find one. When I had two good legs I didn't mind washing my clothes.

"We used to do it at the Argonne and in other parts of France." Then he opened his upper shirt and pointing to the garment beneath, said:

"I have worn this underwear three weeks. I hate like fury to wash it in the bathtub. We could send it down town and have it done at the ordinary rate of expense. But men on $30 a month, who have suffered as we have suffered, feel that the country ought at least do our washing for us.

"Then, again, many of us haven't received any pay for seven or eight months. We are told that we are going to get it. I have had my account fixed up and O. K.'d, and I am told it will come; but I am wondering when, and a great many other boys are wondering the same thing."

HAVE TO BORROW CAR FARE.

It is not an uncommon thing to see several soldiers late in the afternoon trying to borrow a dime from their more financially fortunate "bunkies" to pay car fare down town and back.

That is the way the War Department is taking care of the boys from the other side. I repeat, if there was nothing else in this bill than the proposition to take it from the War Department and put the matter under the control of he Treasury Department—that is, the care of those discharged from the service—it would evoke my approval and my vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman states that the War Department is inefficient and incompetent to do this work. How does he figure that the Treasury Department will do better?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have never heard any complaint of the Bureau of the Public Health Service in regard to the functions they have been called upon to perform. I say candidly that if it was to be left to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the Treasury Department, as it has functioned heretofore, I should be as intensely opposed to it as I am intensely in favor of this proposition coming under the Public Health Service, although, to do justice to those in charge now of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, I want to say that under the present management I have seen a great improvement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask a question for information. There have been so many contradictory statements made in the course of this debate that some of us are in doubt as to what to do. What has the gentleman to say in regard to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] that, as a matter of fact, none of the hospitals to be provided for by this bill would be used by the soldiers returning from abroad?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not understand it in any such way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made that positive assertion.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman is altogether incorrect. I want to show what the gentleman from Pennsylvania omitted from his report, and that will show exactly what the gentleman was wanting to put in and what he wanted to leave out. He quotes from Col. Smith's testimony. Col. Smith said:

It is impossible to state at this time when any of the hospitals now operated by the Army could be released for use by the Public Health Service. While it is believed that we have provision for a sufficient number of beds in Army hospitals, it is also our belief that we require all that we now have in order to provide a reasonable margin of safety for the care of sick and wounded returning from overseas, and the sickness problem which may develop among the troops in this country and returning for demobilization.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in making his minority report, left that out. Let me read you just a little more that he also left out in regard to the hospitals that could be made available. Col. Smith says:

As to the date when any others could be turned over, it is impossible to state at this time, for that depends upon the number of patients for whom we must make provision and the type of the case, which determines the duration of their stay in hospital. It is believed, however, that in six months several of those hospitals could be released, but not before that. The permanent general hospitals would not be available at all.

That is the language of Col. Smith, which the gentleman left from his minority report, and yet it immediately preceded what the gentleman from Pennsylvania did quote.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman has his own time.

Mr. KREIDER. I know, but the gentleman makes an accusation. I want simply to say this, that none of the general hospitals that are owned by the Government are suitable for tuberculosis patients, but there are eight hospitals under the control of the War Department that are, and I enumerate them in my report and give their capacity in respect to beds, and so forth; so that I have been entirely fair.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania name these hospitals and will he point out in the RECORD where the War Department has ever said they would turn over a single one to the Public Health Service? They said positively they would not.

Mr. KREIDER. I can do it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let the gentleman do it in his own time.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, here we have been two days on this bill. A short time ago there was one hospital that we asked to have constructed, and gentlemen over on that side, who are now rallying against this bill, made the argument that there ought to be a general scheme for such hospitals. Now we come in with a general scheme and for two days gentlemen have been fighting that. Mr. Chairman, we are going to have tuberculosis patients all along, men that have come not only from the ranks in the camps here, but from the shot and shell and the snow and sleet and trenches on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Some one I hear says something about my not hurrying along. Who has been doing the talking? This is the first time that I have spoken, and I would not have taken the floor now had not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made the speech he did in regard to turning it over to the War Department. We do not know how big the Army is going to be. We do not know how long these brave men are going to be kept on the other side. We ought not to limit the space that a single soldier gets from the hospitals that the Government now has under the charge of the War Department. If this bill gave only one resting place, one sanatorium, for one single tubercular patient, it would be enough for me to say that we ought to spend the ten and a half million dollars and do it at once. If only one man's life can be preserved, if only one sick or wounded soldier or nurse who went with the Red Cross to the other side is saved, it is enough for me. These people took their lives in their hands and risked them on the call of our Government. I hope gentlemen will not delay longer by wrangling over what department shall have control, when we know that the Public Health Service has heretofore had this very character of work under its control. I hope we will not jeopardize by postponing and delaying one minute longer a bill that affects the very life of many brave men and women who offered their lives for their country. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, in view of the fact that my name appears signed to the minority report, and in view of the further fact that reference has been made to my attitude in reference to this bill, I feel in justice to myself and in deference to the majority of the committee it is necessary for me to make a brief statement. I did not join in the minority report as appears of record in this matter. My name is there by inadvertence. I did vote against reporting the bill in the committee because from the light before me at that time I did not think that all this expenditure of money was necessary—and I have not yet thoroughly made up my mind upon that point—but after I returned to my office from the committee meeting a member of the majority inquired over the phone as to whether or not I would acquiesce in the majority report. I told them if I decided not to do so I would let them know. That was the last I heard of the matter until a few days ago, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] showed me a typewritten copy of the minority report, and inasmuch as I had voted against reporting the bill my name appeared upon this typewritten copy of the minority report. I explained the matter to the gentleman [Mr. KREIDER], and he scratched my name off. But somehow, by some means which I am unable to explain, it appears that some other copy of the report was inadvertently handed to the printer, and my name is printed there. Now, here, gentlemen, is my attitude with reference to these hospitals. I would rather have 10,000 too many beds for returning soldiers than to have one too few. I do not like the idea, however, of having more than 50,000 vacant beds with strings to them, because I want hospital beds that can be used for every discharged soldier, sailor, or marine who may be in need of them; and if we have got 40,000 or 50,000 beds which can not be used for that purpose, I think we need some legislation that will make them available. I do not like the idea of having thousands of beds too many under one branch of the Government and a thousand too few under another. I want it so that every soldier, every sailor, every marine, and every nurse who needs a bed shall be supplied with that hospital bed if the Government of the United States is able to afford it, and I think it is. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Illinois desire to offer a real amendment?

Mr. CANNON. I want to offer a real amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment: To strike out in line 7, beginning with the word "and." I will read the amendment:

And for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON. Page 1, line 7, strike out the following: "and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will yield to me just a moment, I want simply to give notice that I am going to try to insist upon the rule being observed hereafter in debate upon this bill. We have talked all day about it.

Mr. CANNON. I know, but you gentlemen have done most of the talking——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; we have not.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Both upon the committee and off of it. However, I will see when my five minutes are up, and it may be the committee will give me a little more time. It may be I can say all I desire in two minutes or that a man perhaps ought to say. Mr. Chairman, it is time in considering legislation, now that the armistice has been made, and they are coming home to the United States from overseas and being discharged by the tens of thousands, to call a halt in the enactment of legislation and be sure what legislation ought to be enacted. First, what is the real condition; second, what have we to raise revenue for and for what purposes; third, how much useless machinery have we got that is spending money; fourth, what have we to care for in the Treasury for the soldiers and the citizens who are entitled to care; fifth, can we be diverted from the merits of a proposition by patriotic declamations? Why, of course, the United States will take care of every soldier who is entitled to relief under the war-risk act, and those who are entitled to payment or killed and are leaving dependents. Never in the tide of time in this country or any other that ever existed has there been so much guaranteed to the soldiers of any war as we have guaranteed. I merely refer to it. I would not dot an "i" or cross a "t" to take back any pledge we have given to our soldiers, but I am not ready in orating about taking care of the soldier to let creep in along with the soldier the man, the woman, the child, who are not soldiers, and permit them to have relief and treatment in hospitals. Oh, we are caring for the dependents, and that pledge was made if a soldier was killed, and so forth, or if he was wounded, and the Government is caring for the dependents of the soldier by an allotment. It is keeping all of those pledges, every one of them. But now what is the status? First, the civil employees in the War Risk Bureau in the Treasury Department, who never were in the service, not entitled to anything more than anybody else's wife and child and every other civil employee in the Government is entitled to, it is said, and I assume it is true, that we gushed along and are pledged to care for in hospitals now until the time they die, all the civil employees in the War Risk Bureau.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What authority of the law has the gentleman for the statement that the civil employees of the War Risk Bureau would be entitled to the use of these sanatoriums?

Mr. CANNON. The legislation gives it to them. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely not.

Mr. CANNON. Then the whole debate has proceeded along lines that are founded upon a fallacy.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The persons who are entitled to treatment in hospitals as fixed by law are civil employees of the Government injured under the workmen's-compensation act—no relation to the War Risk Bureau at all. And none of the employees of the War Risk Bureau will be entitled to hospital treatment under this bill.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman's own report shows there are others.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; it does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the draft copy of the sundry civil bill, on which hearings are now in progress, there is an item carrying an appropriation of over $1,000,000 for the treatment of those afflicted with venereal diseases under the act of the past year. This bill would give provision for that kind of patients.

Mr. RUCKER. Soldiers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not soldiers.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman knows that the provision of which he speaks will go out under a point of order if anybody makes it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not. The bill specifically enumerates the section under which they claim that authority.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What has that to do with this?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has direct relation to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois so as to prevent this bureau of health from spreading its arms so as to cover everybody in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension of time. I would like 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How much?

Mr. CANNON. I would like 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to this, but——

Mr. CANNON. Do not put it on me. I do not care, so far as that is concerned. I am asking no courtesy that is exceptional. I want to be educated as to what the law is if I do not understand what it is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will not object. Let the gentleman go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CANNON. From the best reading that I can do and from the report it seems that I have been in error in believing that the civil employees of the War Risk Bureau were entitled to treatment in these hospitals.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Permit me right there, as long as the gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Then I may want 10 minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am willing for the gentleman to have an hour if he can show that this bill provides for the civil employees of the War Risk Bureau. I wish the gentleman, instead of making the assertion, would point out from the act where they are taken care of.

Mr. CANNON. I take it from the report there. Let that be as it may——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman knows the bill would settle it. The bill determines that point.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman wants to go back to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is what we are trying to pass. We are not trying to pass the report.

Mr. CANNON. I read:

Additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Patients.

Mr. CANNON. I read further:

And for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service.

Now, my motion is not to strike out the patients of the War Risk Bureau. That can follow later on. But it is for the Public Health Service and others. You enumerate here five or six cases where they are entitled to hospital treatment and then wind up and propose to legislate for all others that are entitled, and when you pass that you can still appropriate for expenditures for the others.

Now, what does "others" mean? Why, gentlemen who have watched the great progress that has been made during this administration, before the declaration of war and since the declaration of war, will find that the Treasury Department through the Public Health Service, by appropriations made by Congress, sometimes without legislation and sometimes with the legislation, has so greatly extended the power of the Public Health Service that there is not one citizen in a thousand in the United States that understands what has been done. For instance, there have been appropriations made to take care of epidemics; appropriations made to take care of venereal diseases. We spend great blocks of money to protect the soldiers in the cantonments, and then we are spending great blocks of money, without cooperation of the States and with the cooperation of the States, with which, from my best judgment, as near as I can ascertain in haste, you can take people afflicted with various diseases in civil life who require treatment in a hospital and put them in a hospital and treat them at the public expense. Does anybody dispute that? The gentleman is silent.

Now, I am not for it. I want every citizen, great and small, to stand with equal privilege before the law, and to care for our soldiers and sailors and their dependents as we have cared for them. Therefore I take it that this amendment ought to prevail.

Now, then, a word about the hospitals. I have read this report. I have been tolerably busy since this Congress met in the Committee on Appropriations, headed by Mr. SHERLEY, on a deficiency appropriation bill, a bill that has taken my time, almost every minute of it, from the commencement of this session up to the present moment. We have reported that bill, and I suppose it will follow this one. We will discuss it when we come to it. But I think it is the most important bill that has been or will be passed during this session of Congress.

Now, we got ready for this war in haste. There are 16 camps and 16 cantonments in the United States, on leased ground in the main. Wherever those camps and cantonments are all, as I understand it, are equipped with hospitals. A hospital means a place for the treatment of the sick and wounded, with all accommodations for the doctors and with all the accommodations for the nurses. Now, we are not needing those camps and cantonments much longer. We are not drafting people to send to them. But here is this property that Uncle Sam owns. To construct a hospital such as this bill contemplates, as near as I can tell from reading of the report, means $3,000 a bed; that is, to make the bed available. And it would take from two to four years to construct a hospital as desired by the supporters of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. How long? From two to four years?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. We discussed this a little bit when we had the Kentucky proposition before us for a hospital, as you will recollect.

Now, I want to say another thing, and with high respect, for I suppose I am as selfish as most Members of Congress, if not all Members of Congress, in caring for my constituency. But you may take Document No. 14 and Document No. 16 of these hearings, and you may read them all through, and you will find there that the anxiety about the location of the hospitals, the hearings about their location, was pretty near, you know, in interest to many members of that committee, interested in building hospitals in the back yards of their districts, or in their sections. I do not care where they are built, provided they are properly located and built, and provided that they ought to be built at all.

I believe this bill ought to be amended, instructing the War Department and the Navy Department to turn over all these camps and cantonments for use as hospitals for the people who are entitled to relief therein. We have over 100,000 beds, with 50,000 occupied, it is said. A fair reading of these hearings shows that the great mass of men who come back and are not well, but sick, are kept by the War Department until they get well, and then they are discharged. That appears in the hearing. I pause to have it contradicted. Is there any contradiction?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. The gentleman makes the challenge, and I will accept it. I want to call his attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the statements of some of the officials of the War Department that they did not discharge men until they were cured, there were 24,500 tuberculosis cases in the Army that have been discharged, and they are discharging them to-day at the rate of 250 per week.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; a number of months or weeks of treatment is given for tuberculosis cases. Great stress is laid upon tuberculosis treatment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I am going to ask, Mr. Chairman, for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Tuberculosis is a terrible disease, but from all the reading that I have been able to give to this hearing and everywhere else I find that there is a certain stage of tuberculosis that practically can not be cured, but there is an earlier stage of it where, with the great improvements in treatment, recoveries are had. What you want is not granite walls and air-tight compartments. That may be contradicted by somebody who will follow me, if he wants to. What we want is sunlight and air, fats and good healthy food to eat. That is the treatment, and about the only treatment, as I have been informed by skilled physicians; that is the only treatment that is proper for tuberculosis. This record shows that after a few months those that are curable are very apt to be discharged cured.

Now, then, suppose a man who has been in the Army contracts tuberculosis after he is discharged. Then he is treated by the doctor in his neighborhood at the expense of the United States. That is the scheme. Or he is treated in a hospital. I am not here to say that such treatment should be denied. We have been liberal with the soldiers. We were liberal with the soldiers of the Civil War. But I am here to say that I believe from these hearings and from this bill and from the legislation that has been had, even before the war commenced, extending the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service, coupled with what has happened since that time, the time has come to call a halt. Not in caring for the soldier, but in caring for the soldier taking care also for the civilian, playing favorites.

Now, I think that is all I want to say. I shall vote for the amendment which I have offered, because that amendment takes care not only of everybody who is entitled under the law to be cared for now, but as legislation may be enacted hereafter, it will take care of them without any further enactment.

I want to refer to the Public Health Service, and I do it respectfully. The head of that Public Health Service is one of the ablest men I have ever met. He is a thorough gentleman. But he is like all the balance of mankind, some stronger and some weaker, in that he tries to extend his jurisdiction and his work, and in many instances I think not for the public good.

Mr. RUCKER. Before the gentleman takes his seat, may I ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman realizes, from what he knows historically about the war, that it is altogether probable that tuberculosis will develop in many cases after discharge when it is not present at the time of discharge?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Those people, I believe you stated, ought to be treated by the Government?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but I want to say one other thing: In the legislation that we had caring for the soldiers of the Civil War, they had to prove their injuries by official records.

Mr. RUCKER. That is, in order to get a pension?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; to get a pension. Or they had to prove it by witnesses; and they had to trace the present condition to the service in line of duty. Now, I do not want anything so severe as that for the soldiers of this war.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman will realize that injustice was done to thousands of men by reason of that harsh rule?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I realize all that.

Mr. RUCKER. If a man, able and well, is accepted into the service and after the battle is discharged and suddenly afterwards develops tuberculosis, would not the gentleman agree that that man should be treated by the Government?

Mr. CANNON. I have already stated that I would have him treated by the Government.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will say it with his usual emphasis.

Mr. CANNON. I have already said that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] is glib of tongue and of great ability, and I want to compliment him on his ability. He comes with great strength, and he picks up this newspaper report about the Walter Reed Hospital, about the inmates there having to do their own laundry work, one-armed and one-legged men. Good God! The appropriations are available, and it is your administration as well as mine. You made it; I did not. I am not in party harmony with it. In many instances I have supported it. But instead of criticizing this or that or the other thing that can be remedied by administration, why do you not take some of these people by the nape of the neck and the slack of the breeches and throw them out of the public service? [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I would be glad to do it if I could; but the gentleman has as much power to do it as I have, and I say therefore let us not give them any more power than they already have.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; you control. You have got the President; you have got the Congress. You control it; and while I am not lying awake at night to deny that it has been a difficult task, we helping you as best we could and not throwing chunks in the way, I think the rocks and mountains ought to fall on you, at least temporarily, and put you out of complete power and let us unscramble the eggs. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the splendid laudation of the head of the Public Health Service by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just taken his seat, I would like to call his attention and also the attention of the House to the letter of the head of the Public Health Service, Robert Blue, Surgeon General, which was printed in my remarks of Saturday. I want to refer specifically to this statement:

> It has been stated that the policy of the Army is to keep its tuberculosis cases until they are incapable of further improvement. As a matter of fact, of the 1,724 war-risk cases now actually under treatment 930 are cases of tuberculosis which have been discharged from the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. That statement is not at all inconsistent with the other.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And in order to rob this discussion of its uncertainty, particularly where figures are concerned, I want to call the attention of Members, who will take the time and pains to do so, to page 2056 of the RECORD of Saturday, which contains, not the statements or the inferences of men from these departments, given casually two months ago or one month ago, but the figures right up to January 17, 1919; and in the last report from the War Department you will find that their statement is that they have only 42,530 beds, and you will also find on that page a statement that there are 120,000 wounded men now under treatment in French, English, and American hospials on the other side.

Now, coming specifically to this amendment, I want, with all due deference to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to submit to his judgment this proposition——

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. On the page referred to the total number of men receiving treatment in French and British hospitals is stated to be 8,000, and the vacant beds 42,530.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman is reading from the wrong table.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am reading from the table on the page the gentleman referred to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I call the gentleman's attention to Exhibit D, wherein it is stated that the total number of men receiving treatment in American hospitals in France, including the English and French hospitals, as reported from American Expeditionary Forces January 2, was 120,391.

Mr. TEMPLE. The total number that had received treatment all told?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The total number that were receiving treatment on that date. The gentleman is looking at the comparative table in Exhibit C, where the number of men receiving treatment in the various hospitals are compared as of November 28 and January 17. When the figures were differentiated the War Department showed that there were 8,000 men receiving treatment in English and Franch hospitals, and 182,569 receiving treatment in American hospitals.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; that is correct. The number not in American hospitals is stated at 8,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But as of January 2 there are 120,000 men receiving treatment in English, French, and American hospitals combined.

Mr. TEMPLE. With 42,000 vacant beds in American hospitals.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Over here; yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How many vacant beds in American hospitals?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Forty-two thousand.

Mr. KREIDER. And 15,000 more being completed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Let me proceed.

Mr. KREIDER. Those men who are being treated are not all of them wounded. Some of them are sick.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is true.

Mr. KREIDER. And not 50 per cent of them will apply for treatment after they return to this country.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is merely an inference and a conjecture. If you are willing to draw conjectures of that kind against this bill and against the soldier, I ask you in all fairness to use your sane thought and vision, to infer that thousands of these boys who have been in the trenches and who come back here with their lungs sloughing away as the result of being gassed and as the result of other diseases are likely in the future to appeal to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for relief; and we have the figures to show that 14,200 of them up to date have made application, and that these applications are coming in at the rate of 250 a day.

Mr. KREIDER. But those are not men who have returned from overseas.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, getting down to the specific amendment before the House, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say, with all deference to him, that if that amendment were passed, it would take the vitals out of this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is willing?

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Florida is not here, and in his absence I ask it.

Mr. MANN. He is willing to have the time extended?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If this amendment were to pass and we were to cut out these lines on page 1, it would repeal every law that you have been enacting since 1798 putting responsibilities upon the Public Health Service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How would it repeal the law to say, while providing additional hospital accommodations, that people already entitled to hospital accommodations should be entitled to these additional ones?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will show the gentleman how it would effectually repeal the law.

Mr. MANN. It would take more than five minutes to show that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, no; have patience. It would have the effect to repeal, although not specifically repealing the existing law, for this reason: That the Public Health Service is required to treat certain departments of the Government—for instance, the Coast Survey, the Geodetic Survey, and persons injured under the workmen's compensation act. Now, all of the other departments are to be excluded from the terms of this act, and we are asked to provide for additional facilities for the exclusive benefit of the soldier, the sailor, and the marine under the proposition in the gentleman's amendment. If this amendment were to be adopted, while nominally on its face it would prevent the additional facilities being used by any but soldiers and patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, it would have the effect of not only including them but it would vitiate all of our previous legislation on this subject. It would do that for the reason that the Public Health Service is now treating patients beyond its capacity; they have sent patients to outside hospitals, and they have not room to-day to treat the men who are wounded in the service. They have not the facilities. If gentlemen will look at Exhibit F, on page 2056, they will find that in 1918 the total patients treated were 12,797, and that the total patients treated in contract hospitals during 1918 were 7,812. Now, what do you want to do by the amendment? You say nobody shall have the benefit of the additional hospital facilities of the Public Health Service except the soldiers, sailors, and patients of the War Risk Bureau. What is going to become of those entitled by previous laws to treatment? Do you not see that if you emphasize the fact that it must be used by discharged sailors and soldiers you thereby exclude the other beneficiaries, and for that reason I hope this amendment will not prevail, because it would repeal prior laws?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Are there many soldiers and sailors that have taken no part in this war?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know; this bill provides for soldiers and sailors, and that is the main purpose. We can better serve the interests of the sailors and soldiers and marines by giving the Public Health Service a little latitude. If you adopt this amendment, it is true you will prefer the soldiers, sailors, and marines, but you exclude all other people who are entitled to treatment under previous laws or you compel them to send their patients to a contract hospital, as they did in 1918.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I understood from the arguments made by the gentleman from New York and others in favor of the bill that there was immediate need for additional hospitals for discharged soldiers and sailors, and that the primary purpose of the appropriation here asked was to provide additional hospitals for such soldiers and sailors. The mere fact that you now limit the use to such soldiers and sailors would not in any sense work a repeal of an existing law authorizing the Public Health Service to provide hospital facilities for others, but would limit the use of the additional hospitals acquired hereunder to discharged sailors, soldiers, marines, and Army nurses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. That with the consent of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman from Florida has stepped out, and it was understood that I was to answer the proposal of the gentleman from Illinois, and I am trying to do it the best I can, if I only get a chance.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from New York is asking the consent of the House and not the consent of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MANN. No; but the gentleman from Florida gave notice that he would object to any requests for unanimous consent to extend the time after my colleague had finished his speech. I just wanted to know the attitude of that side of the House. I do not want an objection made when some one asks to extend the time on this side and then be absent when some one wants an extension on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the debate has gone along wearily. There is an appropriation bill ready for consideration, and while I would not object, of course it does seem to me that the members of the committee ought to try to make some progress on this bill, so that appropriation bills can be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked by the gentleman from Alabama whether or not this bill is exclusively intended for soldiers and sailors and the marines. I answer emphatically that it is, but the lines which were put in this bill by the framer, namely, "for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service," were put in there as a protection—to prevent the other beneficiaries of the Public Health Service from being crowded out. In other words, I want to make it plain that we are providing additional facilities for the soldiers and sailors and marines, and also in providing those facilities we do not want to shove the other fellows out who by prior laws are entitled to the benefit of treatment by the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Surely.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me the gentleman can not find any other Member of the House on either side that would agree to the statement the gentleman has just made. He says this gives preference to soldiers and sailors. There is nothing in the bill that shows that it gives any preference.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I said it was the intention of the framers to give preference to the soldiers and sailors and marines; but, exercising the proper foresight and intelligence, the bill drafter provided by this law that we should exclude no one entitled by prior laws to the consideration of the Public Health Service. Mr. Chairman, the committee is opposed to this amendment, and I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This information may have been given before, but I have been out of the House on business. Take the case of a man called by the county board sent to some camp and after staying there two weeks it is ascertained by the medical examination at the camp that he had some disease which rendered him incapable of rendering military service and he is sent home. Would such an individual be a beneficiary under this bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. He would be. He would be entitled to treatment, because the Government assumed authority over him when he was taken by the local board and was considered in good health. The mere fact that there are a few thousand men in that category, and only a few thousand, should not blind us to the fact that there are 1,167,574 volunteers who are entitled to treatment under this act. Furthermore, there are 2,818,000 drafted men who passed the local boards and the Army surgeons, who were inducted into the service, many of them going across the sea—more than 4,000,000 altogether—who will be entitled to treatment under this law.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I can not agree with the answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] has just given to the question propounded by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. I think in the case he stated the soldiers referred to would not be entitled to the benefits of this provision, for the reason that the law to which the gentleman evidently had reference provides that all soldiers who were examined, accepted, and enrolled shall be the beneficiaries, not merely those who were inducted into the camps by the district board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MANN. Five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I move that at the expiration of five minutes all debate shall close upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves that after the expiration of five minutes all debate on the amendment be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill is primarily for the purpose of providing hospital accommodations for the men in the military and naval services who have been discharged from the service. We want to take care of them. We want to provide additional accommodations for them, but we want to know that they receive the benefit of what we do. The bill goes further than that. It provides for the accommodation of all others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service. Some gentlemen stated on the floor to-day that there were 50,000 of those. I do not know how many there are. Nobody knows. The present accommodations of the Public Health Service, the old marine hospitals, are fairly well taking care of those now committed to the Public Health Service for treatment outside of the discharged soldiers and sailors. There is no demand upon the part of the country, there is no need so far as appropriations are concerned, for us now to make special provisions for the others already provided for. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] said that to agree to the amendment of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to strike out this language would be to repeal existing law. That is solely erroneous. There is no repeal of existing law. Those people now entitled to the Public Health Service in the present hospitals, or under contract, would still be entitled to treatment in the same way, but they will not be entitled to preference over the boys discharged from our Army and Navy in these new hospitals. We want to give the boys the preference in the new hospitals. I do not want to provide additional accommodations here for the discharged soldiers and sailors, and then find they are crowded out by somebody from the merchant marines who claims he is ill, or by somebody whom they are entitled now to treat, somewhere in the country, either in the cities or in the rural districts. Let us say emphatically to the boys who are coming home, "We will provide for you by these additional accommodations in the hospitals, and we will see to it that you get the benefit of them." [Applause.] Let us do that instead of providing, through a subterfuge, additional hospitals so that somebody else may get the benefit of them and possibly crowd out these soldiers.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I have only five minutes, and the gentleman must make his question short.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman knows, of course, that all these other people are now provided by law to be taken care of?

Mr. MANN. That is not a question. I have just stated that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Would the gentleman object to treating these people in case the soldiers and sailors are taken care of and then some beds are left over?

Mr. MANN. There is present capacity for these other people. When we have these hospitals in operation and we have spare beds in them, Congress will still be in existence, and it then can provide, if necessary, that the extra beds may be used by the civil patients. Give these boys the first chance. Do not let the Public Health Service use us, through a demand for the treatment of our returned soldiers, to get additional accommodations which they would like to have at all times, but the need for which they have not yet been able to impress upon the minds of Congress. Give the boys a chance. Strike that language out, and if this bill becomes a law, as I hope it will if the language goes out, the boys will have the beds in these hospitals.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. After the word "service," in line 8, insert:

Provided, That discharged, sick, and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, and Army and Navy nurses, male and female, shall first be provided for.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order. It is not a substitute. It has no relation to the text in the bill which it is proposed to strike out. Such an amendment could be offered if the language does not go out, but it is not germane now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It seems to me that it is entirely germane and in order, because it is an effort to perfect the bill in the respect of which the gentleman complained, and surely the gentleman meant what he did?

Mr. MANN. Surely, and if this language stays in the bill, I would like to see the gentleman's amendment adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That would meet his objection and take care of the soldiers and sailors. That was the intention of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, this debate——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am discussing the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Very well; I am willing to talk about the point of order all afternoon.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am trying to show why it is germane. The intention of the bill was to take care of these people first, and in case there were more beds than they needed, why not let the other beneficiaries of the laws which we have passed from year to year get the benefit of them. There are over 7,000 of them right now in contract hospitals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Section 5790 of Hinds' Precedents provides—

To a motion to insert words in a bill, a motion to strike out certain words of the bill may not be offered as a substitute.

The rule vice versa also is considered to be good. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken and sustains it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I give notice if this amendment be voted down——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order again.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted, and the question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Let us see whether it is necessary or not.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that while the vote indicated what the result might be in point of fact the noes have never been counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes the gentleman is correct. All those in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] The ayes are 65. Those opposed will rise. [After counting.] The noes are 22. Upon this vote the ayes are 65 and the noes are 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall ask the committee to rise and rerefer this bill to the committee. There seems to be a disposition not to make any hospital provision, so I do not think it is necessary to proceed with the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that would be a wise thing to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. WALSH. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. There are no amendments pending, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in securing additional sites herein provided for, may request the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, or the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the Treasury Department such lands or parts of land under their control, not required for other purposes, as may be found suitable for this use, and they are hereby authorized to make such transfer as may be in the interest of the Government.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning in line 18 and ending in line 25, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury, in securing additional sites, buildings, fixtures, appliances, furnishings, or furniture herein provided for, may request the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of Labor to transfer to the Treasury Department such lands or parts of land, buildings, fixtures, appliances, furnishings, or furniture under their control, not required for other purposes, as may be found suitable for this use, and they are hereby authorized to make such transfer as may be in the interest of the Government: Provided, That nothing shall be expended out of the amounts authorized by this act until all buildings, grounds, furniture, and furnishings available for hospital purposes not needed by the said departments or officers of the Government hereinbefore mentioned have been turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, after the words "herein provided for," strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The committee accepts that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I submit the vote ought to be put on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I submit that we have a right to offer a further amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The amendment which was adopted was an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the committee amendment. The committee amendment itself has not been adopted.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GANDY. I want to inquire whether or not, this being a further amendment to the committee amendment, it ought not to be heard and considered before the vote is taken on the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair thought the objection was raised that it could not be offered at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all; any amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "authorized," insert the words "and directed."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That amendment is acceptable to the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 16, add the following to the paragraph:

"Provided further, That when the Secretary of the Treasury shall not have further need of such lands or parts of land, buildings, fixtures, appliances, furnishings, or furniture so transferred, he shall cause the same to be returned to the jurisdiction or control of the the department or officer of the Government by whom such transfer was made."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the War Department turns over a building to the Public Health Service which it uses for a good while. What is the object when the Public Health Service gets through with it of requiring that service to turn back to the War Department the buildings, all surgical appliances, and everything else they have with it? Why could not the Public Health Service, the Treasury Department, dispose of it just as well as the War Department?

Mr. GANDY. I want to say this to the gentleman who raises the question. My thought is that there are many places where the War Department, and perhaps other departments, have both lands and buildings that for occupancy for a time they might not have objection to transferring jurisdiction and control to the Treasury Department if they knew under the language of this bill after the Treasury Department gets through with it that they would get the property back. I have no thought that any land will be transferred or any buildings will be transferred under this provision as it now is. I have in mind a military post that has not been in use for some number of years, where there are accommodations for a large number, where every building is either steam heated or furnace heated, where there is hot and cold water in every building, where every building, unless it be two or three, are either of brick or stone construction. Now, it is entirely possible that under the provision of this amendment, where a transfer of property is authorized, that to meet this emergency the War Department might consent to permit a post of that kind to be used by the Treasury Department, but I do not believe that department would turn it over unconditionally.

Mr. MANN. I can see the point of the gentleman's provision, but how would it be where the War Department now has a hospital rented and wished to turn over the rented hospital to the Public Health Service? At the end of the term absolutely, under the gentleman's amendment, they would be required to do an impossible thing, maybe, that would be sufficient to turn it back to the War Department.

Mr. GANDY. I take it that under the provisions of this bill that on leased property the War Department, inasmuch as these leases are subject to cancellation on very short notice, would simply cancel its lease and the Treasury Department take a lease in its own name. I have not any thought that they are going to transfer leased property from one department to another. But there is a lot of property that the departments of the Government own and do not use.

Mr. MANN. It may very probably happen. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted, because it is absolutely unnecessary. I do not think we ought to try to legislate here and go through all the ramifications of the years to see what shall be done with this property. If the property is turned over by the Treasury Department to the Public Health Service and the time comes when there is no longer any need for it, the matter is in the hands of Congress, and they can direct that it be turned back if they so desire. There will be no trouble there at all, and I can not see what earthly use the amendment will be.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know as I understand what the amendment is. It seems that the Public Health Service is going to become one of the most important adjuncts in connection with our Federal service. They have been given jurisdiction over marine hospitals. If we are going to have a merchant marine, we are going to have need for increased marine hospital service, and the Public Health Service will have its activities largely increased. I do not know whether I clearly understand the gentleman's amendment or not. Is it mandatory that the Public Health Service, provided the War Department needs certain buildings, certain grounds, certain lands, shall return them to the War Department or to the Navy Department, and that, in addition to returning the property, they return appliances?

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I am asking that question.

Mr. GANDY. The language of this committee amendment provides that various governmental departments may turn over buildings and grounds available.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It provides now that they shall turn them over.

Mr. GANDY. If they do not need them. Under the language of the amendment I have offered, it simply provides that when the Treasury Department no longer needs it, the property turned over shall be turned back.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the language of the gentleman's amendment clear enough so that it will be understood that when they are not any longer needed they shall be turned back?

Mr. GANDY. It so states.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 3, line 16, after the word "Treasury," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and add the following: "and for the purpose of determining the needs of the War Department, the Surgeon General shall, on the first day of each month after the passage of this act, file with the Secretary of War a detailed statement showing the needs of the War Department for hospital purposes, having regard to the number of soldiers needing hospital treatment who may be expected to be returned from abroad."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment as not being germane to the amendment offered or to the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not believe I hardly need argue that, Mr. Chairman. It is certainly germane. It explains the application of the committee amendment and specifies the manner in which it shall be applied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will address himself to the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I prefer, if I may be permitted, to reply to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, it is very simple to me. I am not a parliamentary expert and do not make any claims in that direction. But here is a bill dealing distinctly with discharged soldiers and sailors, over whom the War Department has no possible jurisdiction. Now, here is an amendment offered requiring the Secretary of War to make certain reports about the hospitals needed, and all that kind of thing, by the War Department. Now, right upon its face it appears to me absolutely not germane to this bill. I shall not discuss it any further.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly obvious, in the first place, that this committee amendment provides that certain hospitals not needed by the War Department shall be turned over to the Bureau of Public Health, and it provides further that these sums shall not be expended until this provision has been complied with. Now, I add right to the sentence that contains that provision with reference to the turning over of these buildings the further provision that there shall be a method provided whereby we can determine what those needs are, and determine whether the War Department is carrying out in good faith the provisions of the committee amendment. It relates solely to the subject of the committee amendment, and is simply a method of determining what these things are which are referred to in the committee amendment. As the matter stands now, there is no way of determining whether the War Department complies with the provision or not. It says that property not needed shall be turned over to the Bureau of Public Health. The only way to find out what is not needed is to get a statement of its needs. My amendment provides a method of obtaining this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Florida, but the Chair is in doubt about the ruling. It seems to me that this bill is applicable to discharged soldiers and sailors, marines and nurses.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. And that the amendment of the gentleman seeks for a general report from the Secretary of War as to hospitals of all kinds and classes, to be made annually, which goes outside of the purpose of this bill and, it seems to the Chair, beyond it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, if the Chair will notice, that has got to be determined by the War Department. The sole question is whether it will express this determination in writing where somebody will find it, or whether it will be found in the mind of some War Department official.

The CHAIRMAN. But does not the gentleman's amendment apply not only to those hospitals provided for by this bill but to all hospitals controlled by the War Department?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and so does the bill refer to other hospitals. It says "Those buildings that are not needed for other purposes."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's amendment simply applied to all these hospitals that the Secretary of War may turn over under this bill, it might be germane; but it certainly is not germane when he wants to have made this exhaustive report as to all hospitals under their control. This bill does not deal with the War Department. It does not deal with soldiers and sailors.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman claim that it does not deal with the War Department, when it expressly requires the War Department to turn over those hospitals?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So is the Navy Department, and so is the Department of Labor and the Interior Department, and practically every other department of the Government. You might offer amendments here until doomsday, asking all those people to make reports about the operations of their departments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That would not have anything to do with the question of whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is uncertain.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The purpose of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors. The amendment calls upon the War Department to furnish information as to the universal needs of the War Department.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. That is one thing that has got to be determined by the Secretary of War before he turns over these buildings under the terms of the bill. If he needs the property for other purposes, he is not required to turn it over.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Where is that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. On page 3, line 8. He says they shall turn over what "is not required for other purposes."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But this is not limited to information in that connection. It directs universal information to be furnished with respect to the needs of the War Department.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. It limits it to hospital purposes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is the wording of the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish the gentleman had noticed the reading of the amendment more carefully. It refers to the needs of the War Department for hospital purposes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The amendment provides for information concerning the needs of the War Department.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I ask that the amendment in this connection be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 3, line 16, after the word "Treasury," strike out the period, insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add the following: "and for the purpose of determining the needs of the War Department the Surgeon General shall on the first day of each month after the passage of this act file with the Secretary of War a detailed statement showing the needs of the War Department for hospital purposes, having regard to the number of soldiers needing hospital treatment who may be expected to be returned from abroad."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will not take up further the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is that an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let us get through with this amendment first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will withdraw that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is no last word. I suggest that the gentleman wait until the next paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to speak on this amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But the amendment is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion ought to come on the next section read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to speak on this amendment, if the Chair pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I rose before the Chair put the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was then exhausted on that amendment, and there was nothing of the amendment then before the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I object. I would like to have the next paragraph read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment as a new paragraph, following the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: After line 16, on page 3, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Where classes giving instruction to disabled soldiers and sailors are maintained by the Federal Board for Vocational Education under the vocational rehabilitation act at any hospital or sanatorium under the jurisdiction of the United States Public Health Service, the said board is authorized and instructed to admit to such classes all patients at such hospital or sanatorium who are employees in the public service of the United States."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I inquire of the gentleman what is the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Chair is in doubt about that, I would like to be heard on it briefly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I very frankly admit that this amendment possibly does not cover the same field of operation that it would have covered in the event that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had been defeated. But in spite of the action of the committee in adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I think there is a field of operation still left within the bill for the proper application of the subject matter of the proposed amendment. It has been admitted here in this argument that these existing institutions, already provided for by law, for the purpose of enabling the Public Health Service to take care of patients in the public service, will not be abolished or abrogated by this proposed legislation. In other words, Mr. Chairman, if the bill passes in its present form, as now amended up to this stage, it will still be necessary to operate a number of these sanatoriums by the Public Health Service for the purpose of taking care of patients under existing law. There is nothing in this bill, and there is nothing in any provision of it up to this date adopted, that prohibits caring for discharged soldiers and sailors and these other civil employees in the same institution. As a matter of fact and as a matter of practical operation, I have no doubt that some of these general hospitals—I believe four in number—now run by the Public Health Service will have as their patients and inmates not only discharged soldiers and sailors, but some of these men coming under these various classes contained in this report, civil employees, whom it is the duty of the Public Health Service to care for and treat. The language and purpose of the bill is that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and so forth. Now, it certainly is an element of treatment, it is an element of care, as admitted by all known authorities on this subject, to include this proposed training and teaching.

Vocational rehabilitation while in the hospital is regarded as of high value in the therapeutic treatment and functional restoration to health of the patient. The general purpose of this bill is for the care and treatment of the inmates of those hospitals, and the vocational board has already made arrangements and has already instituted classes in different sanatoriums for the purpose of giving vocational training to all in them, but it has no authority of law to give vocational training to these people who are in the hospitals as public employees. I offer this amendment at the earnest request of the Director of the Board for Federal Vocational Education, in order that those men who are still in these hospitals along with soldiers and sailors may have authority of law to take advantage of these vocational classes. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in view of the general objects of this bill, that it is a regulation that would be germane to the general purposes of this bill, as a part of care and treatment, and is not of an exclusive nature.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane to the general purposes of this bill, but that it is along another and an additional line. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in this connection, the letter and memorandum of Dr. Prosser on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and memorandum referred to are as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
Washington, December 23, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BANKHEAD: Herewith I send you copy of the proposed amendment to House bill No. 13026, admitting civilian employees of the United States to the benefits of vocational training for tubercular soldiers and sailors located at the same sanatoria. An explanatory memorandum with regard to the same is attached. I understand that this House bill has been reported favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which Mr. CLARK of Florida is chairman.

It is being sent you with the hope that you may be able to attach it to the bill. Possibly Mr. CLARK may be willing to accept it for his committee. The amendment and proposal has the hearty support not only of the Federal board but of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the Surgeon General for Public Health.

Thanking you for your help in this matter, I remain,

Cordially, yours,

C. A. PROSSER, Director.

1. From figures already available it is abundantly evident that the largest single disability from which men may suffer after discharge from the military or navy forces is tuberculosis of the lungs and chest. As a large number of men suffering from this disability will be subjects for vocational training and placement under the vocational rehabilitation act the Federal board is paying special attention to the problems involved.

2. By an arrangement jointly with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the United States Public Health Service, the Federal board has agreed to undertake the provision of vocational training for all discharged soldiers and sailors sent by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the tuberculosis sanatoria conducted by the United States Public Health Service for the purpose of receiving treatment.

3. The purpose of this training is threefold:

(a) In the opinion of the medical authorities, to whose direction, of course, it will always be subject, it has a very definite therapeutic value.

(b) It will prevent the restlessness and constant desire to give up treatment or to be transferred to some other sanatorium, which is such a well-known characteristic of the sufferer from tuberculosis.

(c) In a great many cases it will have a definite vocational value to the man when his disease is arrested and he leaves the sanatorium, either to return to his civilian occupation or to take more specialized vocational training under the vocational rehabilitation act.

4. Inasmuch as there will be many employees of the public service of the United States receiving treatment in the same institutions in which the Federal board will, under the arrangements with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the United States Public Health Service, provide vocational training for discharged disabled soldiers and sailors, it seems eminently desirable that any training classes which are provided for the training of discharged soldiers and sailors should also be open to the other patients in the institution. This would be done without any increased cost to the Government, as the classes already operated would be small and civilian employees could be admitted with practically no additional expenditure.

5. The suggested amendment to House bill No. 13026, making an appropriation for the erection of hospital sanatoria under the Public Health Service, would make provision for such vocational training for such civilian employees of the United States Government. See attached amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, there is a committee amendment at the desk that applies to this paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the committee proposes a substitute for lines 17 to 25 on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In carrying the foregoing authorization into effect the Secretary of the Treasury may enter into contracts for the lease or purchase of existing buildings, grounds, and equipment, or may enter into contracts for the construction, equipment, etc., of such buildings, or purchase materials and labor in open market, or otherwise, and employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of this authorization.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now let the Clerk read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 3, lines 17 to 25, inclusive, strike out all and insert as follows:

"In carrying the foregoing authorization into effect the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract with any existing hospital or sanatorium, by lease or otherwise, for the immediate use, in whole or in part, of their present facilities. He may enter into contracts for the lease or purchase of additions to such existing buildings, grounds, and equipment, and may enter into contracts for the construction, equipment, etc., of such buildings. He may purchase materials and labor in the open market, or otherwise, and employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of this authorization."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of the substitute offered by the committee the last sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to amend the committee amendment by striking out the last sentence thereof, which reads as follows:

"He may purchase materials and labor in the open market, or otherwise, and employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of this authorization."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the war-time conditions which justified the vesting of great authority in the various executive officers to construct buildings, by hiring labor and purchasing material, have passed. Any person at all acquainted even slightly with the conditions of the building trade of the country knows that contractors are only too willing to take contracts for the erection of any kind of public buildings. The exigency has passed. Prices of materials are falling, labor is plentiful, and now when everyone admits that the exigency has passed, why should we grant this authority that was never thought proper to be conferred before the war? I think it is merely a lapse on the part of the members of the committee in drafting language to meet conditions which existed during the war.

I think the House will recognize the need of allowing the contract method to continue. The law prescribes the method for contracting additional buildings. It is agreed generally that there are plenty of contractors willing to do the work, and why is there need now of authorizing the Government to purchase material, contract for labor, and do the work on its own responsibility? We all know that that method is tremendously more expensive than the contract method. Why should we indulge in it when there are plenty of contractors willing to undertake the erection of buildings?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to say this in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin: This question has been raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin on other bills. It does not confine the department to the buying of material and hiring labor, but it will allow it a broad opening and either let it by contract or, if the contractors are holding up the Government, they can go into the open market, buy materials, and build it itself. It seems to me it is a mighty good thing to go into all public building bills and allow the Government leeway to know that it can not be held up by the conspiracy of builders. Let the Government go into the open market and buy the materials and hire the labor and put up the buildings. They can do it or they can advertise and let it to the lowest bidder. It simply leaves it open for these officials of the Government to do what is best for the Government. I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would not your amendment authorize all this money to be expended for the construction of buildings on leased land?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What is there in the amendment that would restrict the Secretary of the Treasury from constructing buildings on leased land? He could use every dollar of it in erecting buildings on land of some one else. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to read this way, "Provided, That no part of this appropriation can be expended in contract buildings on leased land"?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will show me why that is needed, I will; but what is the use of accepting an amendment if there is no need of it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman's amendment reads:

In carrying the foregoing authorization into effect the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract with any existing hospital or sanatorium, by lease or otherwise, for the immediate use, in whole or in part, of their present facilities. He may enter into contracts for the lease or purchase of additions to such existing buildings, grounds, and equipment and may enter into contracts for the construction, equipment, etc., of such buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That does not say that he may construct the buildings on leased land.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; it gives him authority to take over the leased land and construct buildings, and there is nothing to prevent his spending the money of that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman certainly does not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury would spend millions of dollars to construct buildings on other people's land when he has no authority in the act itself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. You conferred that authority upon him here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This is the authority conferred upon him:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract with any existing hospital or sanatorium, by lease or otherwise, for the immediate use, in whole or in part, of their present facilities. He may enter into contracts for the lease or purchase of additions to such existing buildings, grounds, and equipment, and may enter into contracts for the construction, equipment, and so forth, of such buildings. He may purchase materials and labor in the open market, or otherwise, and employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of this authorization.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That confers on him the authority to lease or purchase.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We provide for those that he may lease, and then we say he may enter into contract to construct hospital buildings. It can not mean anything else.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. What is the date of the introduction of this bill? It was introduced during the war time, was it not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; the bill was introduced in war time, and it is war time now.

Mr. CANNON. Not so badly in war time that we can not go back to the construction under the statutes by contract.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What does the gentleman mean to infer?

Mr. CANNON. I mean the activities of war are not upon us.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly; we recognize that. We are trying to provide for peace times and not for war times.

Mr. CANNON. Does the Government hire hands and buy materials and construct buildings in peace times?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is to be hoped that we learned something in the war, and if we did learn anything we ought to leave something in the hands of the Government, in their discretion, so that they would not be the victims of a conspiracy between the contractors.

Mr. CANNON. Conspiracy is always prohibited.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is all right; but the gentleman knows and we know that when buildings are advertised for that frequently the contractors will get together and arrange for bids which are all understood, and so hold up the Government. I do not say that just such a condition as that exists all of the time; but when it does and the Secretary suspects it, he ought to have the right to go out into the open market.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there anything in existing law that compels the Secretary to award a contract when he suspects there is a combination to raise prices?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no; but what can he do? He can readvertise, can he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not think we should be too technical about the manner of constructing these buildings. I think the main thing is to have them in case of necessity, and there is not a man in the House who does not want ample provision made for treatment. We are all in favor of plenty of hospitals and good service for the men in the Army who return and need hospital treatment. I was not in favor of this bill as originally drawn. I listened to the testimony very carefully before the Public Buildings Committee, and I will say to you that I was not impressed by the testimony, for the reason that the expenditure was large and I thought we had sufficient hospitals already constructed, with 90,000 vacant beds, to provide for this service.

I know that there is not a better cantonment within the confines of the Republic than there is at Battle Creek, Mich. It is steam heated, and the buildings are suitable for this purpose. They are constructed on a high elevation, on the border of a small lake, with fine nurses and eminent physicians. I wish also to say a word of commendation for the splendid commandant, Maj. Gen. Hutcheson, now in charge of Camp Custer. He went through this last "flu" epidemic with the smallest loss in soldiers of any cantonment in the United States, save possibly one or two. It has a capacity of over 2,000 beds, with all equipment awaiting and ready for 1,500 patients. But after the hearing had on this bill it was amended, and I think the amendment makes it unobjectionable to anyone in this House. The following is the proviso referred to, found on page 3 of the bill:

Provided, That nothing shall be expended out of the amounts authorized by this act until all buildings, grounds, furniture, and furnishings available for hospital purposes not needed by the said departments or officers of the Government hereinbefore mentioned have been turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury.

None of this appropriation can be expended until all of the vacancies and the facilities for hospital purposes are turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury for hospital purposes. When that is done, where is there a man who will deny to a man in the United States wearing the uniform of his country, sick, wounded, or afflicted, the facilities of this hospital treatment? I say this bill ought to pass. They can remodel these hospitals and cantonments under this provision. We were then met with the fact that these cantonment buildings were not fireproof. Well, as to that fact, out here at Walter Reed Hospital, one of the best in the country, they are not fireproof. What this department wants is sufficient means at hand to meet the emergency when it arises, and under this bill they can construct hospitals when they are needed and not until then. Therefore I think the bill should pass. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment already pending.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This is to perfect that amendment. I move to amend by inserting after the word "buildings" the words "on land owned by the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment would be in the third degree.

Mr. MANN. There is already an amendment pending to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 13, noes 32.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I now move to amend by adding, after the word "buildings," in line 8, the words "on Government-owned land."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of th eUnion, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13026, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida demands the yeas and nays. All in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 272, nays 7, answered "present" 3, not voting 147, as follows:

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BROWNE, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am paired with the gentleman, and I desire to answer "present."

The name of Mr. CARAWAY was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded "no."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that I may be permitted to withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The name of Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to amend the title of the bill by striking out the word "and" between "soldiers and sailors," insert a comma after "soldiers," and then after the word "sailors" add the words "and marines."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CONDITIONS AT WALTER REED HOSPITAL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask for that time, if the House will be quiet for a moment, in order to read the following resolution:

House resolution 530.

Resolution providing for an investigation of the treatment of sick and disabled soldiers at the Walter Reed Hospital, Washington, D. C.

Whereas the following charges are made in the public press of the city of Washington, viz: That sick and wounded soldiers who have returned from overseas and are now in Walter Reed Hospital have not received any compensation for many months; that the clothing of such soldiers is not laundered for them; that such sick and wounded soldiers are forced to launder their own clothing; and that the food furnished them is not such as should be supplied for sick and wounded persons; and

Whereas these things if true are utterly inexcusable and damnable and a disgrace to this great Nation; and

Whereas the officer or officers responsible for such a condition of affairs should be exposed to the scorn of the outraged people of America and otherwise punished: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of this House be, and hereby is, instructed to immediately, and in preference to all other business, make a full and complete investigation of these charges and report their findings to the House at the very earliest practicable moment, and if they find all or any of these wrongs existing to suggest a remedy therefor and report the names of the person or persons responsible for such outrages on the brave soldiers of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] objects.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. DAVEY, for three days on account of important business.

To Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (at the request of Mr. STAFFORD,) on account of illness.

To Mr. HAWLEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

RELIEF OF STARVING POPULATIONS OF EUROPE.

Mr. SHERLEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a conference report on the bill H. R. 13708, an act providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, for printing under the rules.

PENSION APPROPRIATIONS (H. REPT. NO. 997).

Mr. GALLIVAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 13879, which was the bill passed by the House last Saturday, providing a pension for the widow of the late Col. Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the pension bill for Mrs. Roosevelt. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed, H. R. 13026.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15018) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and pending that I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] as to the division of time in general debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have a number of requests, which will take about three hours on this side.

Mr. LEVER. I intended to suggest to the gentleman that I think we can get along on this side with possibly the half of three hours and a half. I wonder if the gentleman can not come down a little bit in his figures?

Mr. HAUGEN. That would be only one hour and three-quarters on each side.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I can not possibly do that.

Mr. LEVER. Can not the gentleman squeeze along with two?

Mr. HAUGEN. I would be willing to chance it at two hours and a half. The requests will have to be cut about an hour at that.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman can make it two hours on a side.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am sure I would like to accommodate the gentleman. I desire to expedite the passage of the bill as much as anyone.

Mr. LEVER. I am sure of that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will take my chances on that—two hours on each side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Pending the gentleman's motion, it is my understanding, from a talk had with the gentleman from South Carolina, that general debate will run for what length of time it may to-night, and that to-morrow the gentleman will give way in order that there may be taken up for consideration the deficiency bill that I reported to the House a day or two ago?

Mr. LEVER. The understanding is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may inject myself, as to running to-night, if the committee expects to run longer than two hours on general debate to-night, there will have to be a quorum here.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that my hope is to finish the general debate to-night.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will have to have a quorum here.

Mr. HAUGEN. I trust arrangements may be made that half of the four hours may be consumed this evening and two hours at the next time we meet for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that appropriation bills are now ready for the consideration of the House, and we ought at least to complete general debate on this bill to-night. We can do it by 9 o'clock. Some gentlemen need not stay here. I will be here to listen to the eloquence, even if other gentlemen do not desire to listen to it. There will be no business done except that.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman assures the House there will be no other business transacted except speechmaking?

Mr. LEVER. Absolutely none, so far as I know.

Mr. GARNER. And if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] or any other gentleman desires to go to the opera or any other place of amusement or business he can go along, and read the speeches in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. As he always does, I hope.

Mr. GARNER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the general debate on this bill be confined to four hours, two hours to be used by the gentleman from Iowa and two hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall not exceed four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will please take the chair.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that some agreement be reached as to the time of adjournment this evening, that we may, at least, have one hour after to-day. It was understood by one gentleman for whom time was reserved that he was to take it to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. I am glad the gentleman from Iowa mentioned that. There is one gentleman on his side and one on this side who would like to have time for general debate later than to-day. If agreeable to the House, these gentlemen may be permitted to use their time at the conclusion of the bill, when the bill is finished.

Mr. STAFFORD. We could not consent to any such arrangement as that.

Mr. LEVER. I am trying to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let it be understood that three hours of general debate will be consumed this afternoon, and that will leave one hour for the next day.

Mr. LEVER. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina will agree to what?

Mr. LEVER. That three hours' general debate be had this evening, and one hour later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina agrees that three hours of general debate be had this evening, and one hour later.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I make a unanimous-consent request that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will agree that not more than two hours of the debate shall be consumed to-night I will agree to 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GARNER. All they want is three hours to-night.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentlemen from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], as I understand, wants to make a speech on the railroad bill during this general debate, and he is not prepared to make it until to-morrow. I think he ought to be accommodated with time; but what has already been agreed on will accommodate him and also accommodate one man on this side, too.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that the gentleman from Texas has made a request to that effect himself.

Mr. MADDEN. He has not made a request, but I understand he is not ready to go on to-night.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am willing to go on to-night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15018, the Agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15018, the Agricultural appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15018) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one of the greatest duties that a country owes to its people is that which rests upon it with regard to the agricultural classes. No country has long prospered that has neglected and failed to encourage and protect its agricultural class in its legitimate rights and interests. Rome reached the highest point in her civilization when greatest stress and emphasis were placed upon agriculture, and Rome fell when she ceased to protect and safeguard her agricultural interests.

The great Government of the United States owes it to the men who produce the things we eat and wear to protect them from sharks and robbers of every kind. [Applause.] I want to speak a little while this afternoon upon the great cotton industry of the United States, and to call the attention of this House and of the country to the fact that to-day a gambling institution, operating in violation of law, is in existence in the city of New York, and it is destroying cotton values by its future quotations by the millions every day. It has destroyed cotton values this day to the amount of $22,000,000 or $23,000,000. It has destroyed cotton values—11,000,000 bales of cotton—inside of 15 days, $330,000,000. I submit to this House and to the intelligent and fair judgment of the American people that this is wrong, and that it is outrageous for Congress to permit it. It is wrong and outrageous for this Government to permit it.

I want to call to your attention, gentlemen, the fact that when we had prospects of 15,000,000 bales of cotton, cotton was above 25 cents a pound, and when the drouth came in Texas, the greatest cotton-producing State of the Union [applause], and cut her crop in half, and swept through the South, destroying cotton prospects in July, and cutting down our cotton crop prospects to 11,300,000 bales, all told, cotton has been driven down below 24 cents a pound on the exchanges. The future price for January is at variance with the spot price for January $40 a bale. Now, gentlemen, do you not know that that is gambling and that that is highway robbery? The demand for American cotton of the 1918 crop is six or seven million bales more than the supply. The countries outside of America, with Germany and Austria included——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield, my time is so limited. It is believed that Germany and Austria will be receiving cotton by the last of February or the first of March. Some of our friends amongst the allies say Germany and Austria ought to be permitted to receive raw material—cotton, amongst other things—so that they can get to work to make money to pay the large indemnities that will be assessed against them. It is claimed that German interests want 1,000,000 bales now to hold, so that when the time comes that they can receive cotton they may be sure of a part of the small crop. Japan has instructed her agents in Louisiana and Texas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, I am told, to pay a higher price than anybody else to get her supply of cotton and hold it. She realizes that the supply is small. And yet this cotton exchange, day after day, with no cotton to deliver, is tendering the dog-tail stuff upon contracts that no spinner can use.

The spinner can not be supplied from that exchange. It is not helping the producer. It is hurting and robbing him. Then pray tell me, gentlemen, what good service it is performing in our country? What legitimate interest does it serve? The spinner can not get his cotton supply through it. The producer is being robbed by it, and I contend to-day that if this exchange intends to continue to be an outlaw that it ought to be abolished. The Louisiana State lottery is gone. The whisky traffic is doomed, and why not destroy gambling in farm products? Any institution that is morally wrong in its conduct has no excuse for existence in legitimate trade, and I believe that we must come to the idea so ably advocated by my friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] of spot cotton exchanges, of spot produce exchanges of every kind. I have always favored this idea. You do not need an exchange for automobiles, and there are millions and millions of dollars invested in them. It is a flourishing business. You do not need an exchange for horses and mules, yet people deal in them and they make money speculating in them by investing money in them and selling the real article. The hay crop of the United States is nearly as big as the cotton crop. You do not have any hay exchange. Why is it necessary to have a fictitious exchange for cotton and grain, except to give the gambler and the robber an advantage that they can not have in the spot markets of the country? [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman contend that the exchange in New York is violating the law?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do, and I have called on the Department of Justice to-day for an investigation and prosecution.

Mr. HAUGEN. They are delivering the cats and dogs on the contract, the gentleman says, but is it not a fact that the law legalizes the very thing that is being done by the board?

Mr. HEFLIN. I said that they were delivering dog-tail cotton. The law requires that they deliver the standard grades adopted by Congress—nine grades. Of course, the Bureau of Markets has changed and spread out the grades to 21 or 22. I am opposed to this variation and changing of the grades, and I do not think that they are authorized to do it under the law; but here is what I want to bring to the attention of the Congress and the country. When the ocean was full of submarines, when it was difficult to deliver cotton to any foreign port, when it was difficult to get cotton over there at all, cotton went up to 37 cents a pound. When these submarine desperadoes of the deep were looking out for every ship that bore cotton and ready to sink them, the demand for cotton was so great that the exchanges quoted the price at 37 cents a pound. Why was it? Because the world knew that the crop of Europe was a failure; they were producing food supplies on their former cotton area and were looking to America for cotton, and after the drouth in July our crop was cut short and we were going to have a small supply, and the great demand is what put cotton up to 37 cents. That is what did it.

Now, what is putting it down? The submarines are gone from the sea, the embargo against cotton has been removed to all countries except Germany and Austria, and probably that will be removed in five or six weeks. What is it? I ask you gentlemen, as honest men, what causes this putting down of the price of American cotton?

Here is my answer to that: They have a combination with the foreign spinners and some American spinners, and they are back of the bear speculators and are going on the exchange and selling stuff they do not own; no cotton is delivered on contract; they are settling without regard to the price of spot cotton the differences between the various grades. No delivery of cotton and no settlement according to the difference between the grades in the spot markets.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; but I have only a short time.

Mr. SNYDER. When the gentleman speaks of the spinners in this country and the foreign spinners, he includes the spinners of the South?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I think that some of them are in it.

Mr. SNYDER. One more question. The gentleman claims that the exchange in New York is responsible. He does not attempt by that to put the burden of the operation on that exchange in New York—the New York men only—does he?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I am telling you now that some of the foreign spinners are in a conspiracy and combination and are operating on that exchange.

Mr. SNYDER. One more question and then I will sit down. The Democratic Party has been in power for six years, and the same law has been in existence all of that period.

Mr. HEFLIN. This law was passed about four years ago.

Mr. SNYDER. It was passed by a Democratic Congress. Why during all that period have you not changed it?

Mr. HEFLIN. The law is an improvement on the old law. I am in favor of making a change in the present law, as Senator SMITH of South Carolina is. I am in favor of confining them to the delivery on exchange contracts to about six grades of real spinable cotton, and we have got to come to that. The cotton crop of the United States, 85 or 90 per cent of it, is a good grade and would be represented by these six grades. Now they are seeking to use the low-grade stuff—10 per cent of the crop—to fix the price of the 85 and 90 per cent of the good grade. Now, coming back to what I was discussing when interrupted before.

Mr. EAGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I will yield to my good friend from Texas.

Mr. EAGLE. If beating down the price from 37 cents, where it was, to 24 cents, where it now is, in spite of the demand for it, which shows its natural course, if that was for the benefit of the consuming public I should look with more complaisance on it, but the fact is that the spinners of the United States came to the Government a year ago, in anticipation of the purchase of this year's crop, and obtained permission to fix the price for goods, wares, and merchandise of America at the contemplated price of 37½ cents a pound. Therefore, every cent per pound that they beat that price down does not help the consuming public in America at all; it merely robs the poor farmer of the South in order to put money into the spinners' pockets. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, that is precisely true. My good friend from Texas has made a very valuable contribution to the argument that I am trying to make. It has been said on good authority that there is no commodity except iron and steel which plays so great a part in the industrial life of the world and the well-being of its inhabitants as does cotton. Mr. Holland, a recognized authority on all American industries, in the Cincinnati Enquirer, of Ohio, wrote this, from which I read, and he said:

> It is certain that at least for five years after the termination of the war cotton fiber must be relied upon for making up the shortage in wool and flax.

Gentlemen, the wool crop is short, the flax crop is short, the cotton crop is short, and the world is demanding large quantities of American cotton. The ending of the war has set free 151,000,000 spindles, and the sea is free of submarines, but we are permitting in the United States Government a monstrous gambling establishment, and I indict it as such, to beat down without any justifiable excuse the value of the product of thirty-odd millions of American citizens. I have seen cotton sell for $30 a bale. It now costs $30 a bale after it is made to pick it out and gin it and put bagging and ties upon it, and get it on the market. And these figures are not included in the cost of production. It cost 25 cents a pound to produce cotton in America in 1918, and yet the exchange has beaten down the price up to this time more than $40 a bale in two weeks. Figure that on 11,000,000 bales of cotton and see what the cotton producers of the United States are losing. Get facts, gentlemen, in this connection. The South is not selling her cotton, and she is not going to sell it at these destructive prices. The governors of the cotton-growing States have called on the producers to hold it, and why? Because they know that we can not sell it under 30 cents a pound and make a profit, and the only thing that we can do is to hold it for a fair and reasonable price, and we are doing it. As soon as this Congress adjourns on the 4th of March, Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States are going to tour the cotton belt and urge the farmers to cut down their acreage and tell them that, although they have made an 11,000,000 bale crop and the world needs 18,000,000 bales, they are being held up and robbed of a fair profit, and the only wise and safe thing to do is to cut down their acreage. We will tell them, and it is true, we can get more for 9,000,000 bales than for 12,000,000, and why not make something else, where they produce the other 3,000,000 bales?

The boll weevil is all over the cotton belt; it did more damage last year than in any other year. We planted the largest acreage that we have ever planted and made one of the smallest crops. We will greatly reduce our acreage this year. It is hard to produce cotton in the presence of the boll weevil. We will plant this acreage in something else. We can get more for hogs, more for peas, more for velvet beans, for peanuts, and for hay and corn and all those things than we can get for cotton, and there is no gambling exchange to steal away the profit on these things. So, gentlemen, this section of the United States is driven to this course because here is an institution that beats down the value of its products when the world is demanding their crops. Do you know what spot cotton is worth to-day? Twenty-eight, 29, and 30 cents a pound, and the future market for the same month has put it down to 22 and 23 and 24 cents a pound. It is nothing on this earth but robbery and rottenness in the conduct of an exchange that can produce a condition like that. Suppose here is an exchange operating, and you are selling a product that I am holding and the world has got to have it, and I have not enough to supply the world. Here is an exchange using merely the name of cotton and selling it in unlimited quantites and beating down the price of my product, and they beat it down to the exchange price of $40 a bale, $440,000,000 on an 11,000,000-bale crop, and yet I refuse to sell; I am holding my cotton and the world is demanding more than I have, and, remember, the spot price is around 30 cents a pound. Do you not know there is something wrong and rotten when they can do such a thing as that on the exchange? They do not help to keep in operation the law of supply and demand. They defy it. They stop its operation. They destroy the operation of the law of supply and demand.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to yield to my friend, but I have only a very short time. I will yield for a question——

Mr. LAZARO. Cotton is my money crop, and I am very much interested in the gentleman's speech. I am heartily in favor of eliminating every abuse on the cotton exchange; but the gentleman does not mean that he wants a legitimate cotton exchange destroyed, does he?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not the legitimate cotton exchanges. Judging from their present conduct, those that I refer to do not come within that class.

Mr. LAZARO. What about the cotton exchange in New Orleans?

Mr. HEFLIN. The cotton exchange in New Orleans is not as bad as the cotton exchange in New York, but it is following in its footsteps somewhat. The prices on the New York exchange are reflected on the New Orleans exchange; and one reason why the New Orleans exchange ought to be better is because it is in the cotton-producing country. It ought to be a spot market, but the exchange of New York has no such reason for existence.

It is a thousand miles away from the cotton belt. Why is it that you do not have a grain exchange up there? They have got the great grain exchange in the West, at Chicago, where it ought to be. What business have you got with a cotton exchange in New York? New Orleans or some other place in the cotton belt is where you ought to have a big exchange, and it ought to be a spot exchange. I can not discuss that question now, but will later——

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman understands——

Mr. HEFLIN. My time is so short——

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman admits that he is in favor of a legitimate exchange?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am in favor of a legitimate exchange, but they are not being operated as such institutions now and I indict them now as conducted at the present time as enemies to the cotton producer. I am in favor of the prosecution of them and if we can not regulate them I want to abolish them as we abolished the Louisiana State lottery. [Applause.] That is where I stand upon it. An exchange may be needed for hedging purposes, grain and cotton, and, gentlemen, I have a plan. Like life and fire insurance, cotton and grain can be handled. They insure my house; they insure the object itself. They take the risk, and that is legitimate speculation. They insure my life, and if I die those whom I leave behind will get the policy upon my life insurance. Why not have an exchange run upon that system—have real grain or cotton back of every contract. Here is a man who produces 20 bales of cotton. He goes upon the exchange and says, "I want to sell 20 bales of cotton." "Are you a farmer?" "Yes." "Put your name down here, where you live, etc." They keep a record. "You want to sell 20 bales of cotton?" "Yes." The buyer comes up and says, "I will buy your 20 bales for delivery in October." "All right." He is a legitimate speculator, and he is dealing in real cotton. The spinner says, "I have bought 10,000 bales of cotton for my mill, I want to be insured against losses. I want to be protected on the exchange and I will sell futures, 10,000 bales." "All right, I will buy your 10,000 bales," says a legitimate speculator—and then when you get through with that process—and I have not time to go into the details now, I will at some other time—when you get through with it you have confined your speculation in cotton or grain to the crop itself. The merchant, banker, anybody who is interested in spot cotton can use this exchange. And so with wheat and corn. They are dealing in real produce and not in a fictitious stuff that is not in existence. Why, frequently they sell on your grain exchanges millions of bushels of grain more than your crop ever amounted to.

They have sold on the New York Cotton Exchange this year many times the amount of cotton produced in the United States. Now, is that fair? Is it right and just? I want to bring them down to legitimate dealing, and let me say in this connection——

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have not the time, I am sorry. The statement that I wish to read is from the Government's Department of Commerce and Labor. It says:

> The rise in the cost of raw material has been more the result of natural than of artificial causes. There has been a material advance in the prices of practically all commodities, and cotton has shared in this; but in the case of cotton, this advance has also been furthered by a constantly broadening demand for the fiber in the old as well as in the new channels. Cotton is relied upon now in practically all the textile manufactures, either as a primary or a secondary material, and it is utilized in an increasing number in all other manufacturing industries. The ease and rapidity with which cotton fiber is transformed into yarn and its adaptability for all forms of woven fabric accounts for its extensive and increasing use.

It is being put to more use to-day than ever before in the history of the world. [Applause.] It is the smallest crop the world has ever seen with the number of spindles in existence to consume it, and yet when the war is over and people can return to the various fields of activity, when the first crop of cotton is six or seven million bales short of the demand, the manipulators of the exchanges fly in the face of the law of supply and demand and beat down the price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have five minutes if the chairman of the committee has any additional time.

Mr. LEVER. I can not find one single, solitary minute on my list; I have promised it all.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If the chairman will make his allowance to me now I will give just a little bit of that time——

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have five minutes more in which to finish.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was fixed in the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have been interrupted and a good deal of my time was taken up in that way.

Mr. HAUGEN. I had requests for more than three hours' time which was cut down to two hours. I spoke to a number of gentlemen and they gave in part of their time, and I hope with part of that time I will be able to take care of a number, and I hope to be able to take care of all of them.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. I regret very much that I have not the time. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama, but I have promised more time really than I have.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of the general debate to discuss a problem which is not directly dealt with in the Agricultural appropriation bill but which will presently be here for solution. I recognize the fact that the House desires to get through these appropriation bills at the earliest possible moment, and I intend to reach the particular phase of the problem which I intend to discuss by the shortest possible route, eliminating every statement of fact which is not necessary to the discussion which I intend to pursue.

Under the food-control act the President has guaranteed the price of wheat produced in 1919 until the 1st day of June, 1920. I do not intend to discuss the wisdom or the unwisdom of making that guaranty. But I would not be fair to myself or to the administration if I did not say that, in my opinion, the guaranty was wisely made and justified by the conditions which existed at the time it was made as a war measure. But whether it is wise or unwise, we have made it, and I assume it will be the intention of the Congress and of the Government to make it good. Not to make it good will be to invite social, political, and economic consequences which will be far-reaching and long continued. The question which I intend is not whether the guaranty shall be made good but how shall the guaranty be made good. What plan shall be adopted by the Government to make it good? Two plans have been proposed for this purpose. The first of these plans proposes that the Government, using the same machinery and the same methods which have obtained in making good the guaranty of the 1918 crop, shall undertake to maintain the price of the 1919 crop; and, of course, that means maintaining a guaranty not only of price of wheat at the guaranteed level, but also the price of wheat products made from that wheat bought at the guaranteed price. It means that all of the loss represented by the difference between the world's price of wheat of this year—1919—and the guaranteed price shall be implemented against the consumer of wheat flour and wheat products.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I wonder if the gentleman received a letter from the Bay State Milling Co. this morning?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I received that letter.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Under date of January 22. What is your action as to the proposal made by this concern?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am going to discuss the plans I have in mind, and one of them is substantially the same as the plan which the writer of the letter that the gentleman refers to outlines.

The second plan contemplates that the difference between the world price and the guaranteed price for the 1919 crop shall be absorbed by the Government at the source, and that from that point on the wheat shall move forward in the regular commercial channels at the world price. In other words, the second plan contemplates the Government shall pay full guaranteed price to the farmer at his own local elevator, which, of course, would mean the price at the nearest terminal, less the freight, and from that time on the grain shall move through the regular channels at the world price. The statement of these two plans in general is very simple, but they both involve difficulties and possible commercial and economic losses very much greater than the simplicity of the statement would in itself indicate.

I want to very briefly outline, if I can, the objections and difficulties to be met with in adopting either one plan or the other. The objections to the first plan, it seems to me, are not only great but absolutely insurmountable.

The first of these objections is that it is doubtful whether we have the power under the Constitution to extend the war powers under which we passed the food-control act in such a way as to give to the Food Administration or some similar agency the power to carry out the guaranteed price in the sense of maintaining that price throughout the entire period between the 1st of June, 1919, and the 1st of June, 1920. The second objection lies in the fact that the commercial risk involved in handling wheat or wheat products, bought at a price very much higher than the world's price and undertaking to sell that product in the market, is so great or would be so great under the fixed or maintained price theory that no commercial concern could afford to undertake it.

The third objection is that with a large surplus, such as we are likely to have next year, it is desirable to increase consumption. The plan of maintaining the price of wheat and wheat products on the basis of the guaranteed price would result naturally in reducing consumption and thereby defeat the very object which we have in mind.

The fourth objection is that the whole cost of maintaining the guaranty would implement itself against the consumer in this country, while the foreign consumer would get the benefit of our very large export, because, of course, the exports would have to be on the basis of the world's market, and all the sacrifice that would be made by the consumer in this country in maintaining the price would entirely inure to the benefit of the consumer in the foreign country.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does not the gentleman think that if the price were reduced voluntarily by the consent of the Government and by the aid of the United States Food Administration Grain Corporation that would help in itself to establish a low world price?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know that I get the gentleman's question exactly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Well, the action of Congress or our Grain Corporation along the line the gentleman suggests might be an important factor in establishing the world's price.

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably so. In what I am saying I am referring entirely to the theory of meeting this guaranty by maintaining the wheat price, both to the producer and for consumption on the basis of the guaranteed price of wheat. I am not now referring to the other plan.

The fifth objection to which I desire to call attention is that while under the first plan the consumer will have borne the entire loss during the crop year, at the end of June 1, 1920, we shall still have in some way to absorb the loss represented by the difference between the guaranteed price at that time and the world price that then exists; while, of course, under the second plan that I have mentioned, that absorption would take place immediately at the local market, beginning with this crop year.

The sixth objection to this plan is that it involves a larger expenditure, a larger initial capital, both on the part of the Government and on the part of the private commercial concern. It seems to me that these objections are absolutely insurmountable. They are such that the commercial work out of that plan is absolutely out of the question.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. It may not be directly in point, but it is contemplated in all these proceedings that there shall be an embargo on the importation of wheat until June 1, 1920, is reached, to prevent the competition of foreign wheat with our own Government-controlled price.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume that if we should get the maximum or anything like the maximum crop from the present indicated acreage, what would amount to an embargo on the importation of wheat would be necessary; and I may say that, on the basis of the present acreage, the crop might run all the way from 825,000,000 bushels to 1,275,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Do I understand the gentleman to state that in the first plan is contemplated the guaranteeing not only of the price of wheat, but also the price of all the by-products of wheat?

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me that is the inevitable result of it, because a miller or any other wheat-product manufacturer could not afford to buy wheat on the basis of $2.20 and sell his flour on the basis of $1.65; so that a wheat-price maintenance plan contemplates, of course, not only that the price of wheat be maintained, but that also the price of flour to the consumer shall be maintained on the same level, as we have done in the past year.

Mr. SNYDER. Not only flour, but other products?

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me so; yes.

As I have indicated, the Government's loss—and it is probable that there will be a loss on the guarantee—will be taken up at the source—that is, at the elevator at which the farmer sells his grain; and from that time onward the grain shall move forward in the regular commercial channels on the basis of the world's price.

Now, the method of taking up that difference is, of course, a mere matter of mechanics.

A plan that has been suggested is that the farmer who brings his wheat to the elevator shall be given a check for the full guaranteed price indicated at his particular station, and that that check shall be deposited at the bank, and at the bank the proportionate part of it which should be charged to the commercial buyer shall be charged against the account of that commercial buyer, and the balance, indicated by the then existing world market, shall be charged against an account kept for that purpose by the Government. There are other plans of the same sort. The whole question is one, as I say, of mechanics, and one which is certainly not impossible of solution.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman if it bothers him at all in the discussion of the question, but I should like to suggest that the method of settlement which he has just described would involve a very difficult matter of accounting upon the part of the Government in making the settlements and auditing them and checking them up.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no doubt that there is certain room for fraud, and that certain mechanical difficulties are incident to and perhaps inseparable from that method. But they are so small relatively when compared with the difficulty of meeting the guaranty in the other way that I do not think they are, by any means, impossible to overcome. I have talked with men who have had to do with the making good of the guaranty during the current year, and they all seem to think that the mechanics of that proposition can be worked out in some way which will reduce the possible fraud to a very small minimum. I feel confident that that can be done.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. This second plan that the gentleman speaks of is set forth in a letter that I presume all of us got from a millman.

Mr. ANDERSON. It has been incorporated in several letters.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I got only one. It strikes me that there is this danger with it under the Government guaranty of $2.26: The Government has got to make good to that extent. We settle with the farmer at the elevator on the basis of $2.26. That leaves it so that the millmen and the elevator men all over the country have an interest to batter down the price. If they could do it, and get the wheat at 90 cents, then the Government would have to shoulder the additional load.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no chance of battering down the price, because the settlement would be made on the basis of the price at the terminal, where, of course, the ordinary commercial machinery would be in operation, so that the price would be fixed on the world's basis, just as it would be if no guaranty were fixed at all.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. How would you arrive at the commercial price?

Mr. ANDERSON. The commercial price will be fixed in exactly the same way as it would be under normal conditions; that is, by buying and selling upon the exchange.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Would anybody feel interested in keeping up the high price of the wheat? The producer has got his $2.26. Therefore would not the interest at the other end of the line be to beat down the commercial price?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am frank to admit that the situation which the gentleman outlines represents an objection which is at least partially good, but I assume that the Government will be in the market all the time, and that the Government will be prepared to take any surplus that may be thrown into the channels of trade, so that the ordinary channels of consumption and manufacture will never at any time be overloaded with a surplus of the product coming to the mills.

Mr. SLOAN. May I suggest that the Government would be in a position to tell what the average market would be, not only in America but in Liverpool and other places throughout the world, and the Government would practically say what the commercial price was, and speculators could not control it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that would be entirely true.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Not without purchasing it, would it?

Mr. LEVER. And would not this be true: That the farmer would sell his wheat just as fast as possible in order to get the guaranteed price and get the money into his own possession?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think he would, subject, of course, to the fact that the bringing of wheat into the market is, to a certain extent, subject to the convenience of the farmer and road conditions and weather conditions and everything of that sort.

Mr. LEVER. And custom as well?

Mr. ANDERSON. And custom as well. And, of course, the same objection that is urged to this plan is just as sound when urged against the plan of maintaining the price all the way through.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. Speaking of the loss likely to be incurred, is not it fair to assume that, with the arrangement made in cooperation and at the suggestion of those associated with us in the war, they will assume their share of responsibility and bear their part of the burden? As the gentleman knows, it was at their suggestion that the price of American wheat was cut in two, and it is up to them now, after they have entered into the agreement in cooperation with our Government, to make good with proper safeguards so there will be no surplus of wheat.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the gentleman is correct. I now want to discuss a proposition which the gentleman suggests. Despite the fact that we are perhaps confronted with a large surplus of wheat during 1919 over our probable consumption, the loss to the Government on the guaranty will depend not nearly so much on the fact that the surplus exists as it will upon the conditions that exist in this country and the world generally industrially. In other words, if we have an era of prosperity in the country, if we can remove the export limitation, if we can remove the embargo so that we have every channel open for an outlet and can take full advantage of the consumption capacity of the European countries and the low state of their supply, I think there will be very little difficulty in getting rid of this surplus which we have at a fairly reasonable price.

In that connection I want to say that in 1893, when there was a period of considerable depression in this country, we had a crop of 396,000,000 bushels, which was some 100,000,000 bushels less than the average.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That was both winter and spring wheat?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. We had an export that year of 164,000,000 bushels, leaving us net 232,000,000 bushels, which was equivalent to a per capita consumption in this country of 3.5 bushels. Yet with that very small supply in this country, under industrial conditions that then existed, the price still stood at the lowest of any time in the country's history; while in 1915, under conditions of unexampled prosperity in this country, the supply of wheat in the United States was equivalent to 7.8 bushels per capita, and the effect upon prices in the United States was practically not noticeable. In other words, if we can have generally throughout the world a condition of industrial prosperity, there will be no difficulty in absorbing whatever surplus of wheat the country may have.

In addition to that it is noticeable that most of the increase acreage of both spring and winter wheat will result in the almost equivalent decrease in the acreage of corn. So that, taking the rough products of the farm as a whole, there will not be anything like the actual surplus indicated by the present acreage. After all, the whole question here, it seems to me, and the whole proposition now confronting Congress and the country, resolves itself into establishing a condition of confidence in the Government's ability to maintain the price of wheat during the present crop year and establishing a condition of industrial stability in the country for the next crop year. In other words, if we are not successful in creating a condition of confidence of the country touching the maintenance of the present price and touching conditions for the next year, we may have a situation in which the price of wheat, and probably of other farm products in sympathy, will go far below the normal cost of production. And, incident to that, we may suffer a loss in farms and farm-land values which will far exceed any possible loss that any reasonable man can conceive under the proper administration and payment of the difference involved in the guaranty.

But there is one other situation I want briefly to discuss and that is the question involved in the stepping down from the guaranteed price of wheat to the world's price which will confront us at the beginning of next April.

I do not know that Members generally know it, but it takes about eight to ten million bushels of flour moving from the mills to the channels of consumption constantly, and about the equivalent of eight to ten million barrels of flour in wheat, which would be around 40,000,000 bushels moving from the elevators to the mills in order to supply the consumption of the country.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman means per month?

Mr. ANDERSON. I mean that much is in transit all of the time. That means that the period between the consumption at one end and the country elevator at the other is in the neighborhood of 60 days. During these 60-day periods the miller is receiving the wheat at the guaranteed price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. During the same period the wheat is coming into the market and flour is being made out of it on the basis of the world's price. Some means must be found whereby we can step down from the one basis to the other without putting all of the mills in the country out of business. How this may be done I am not prepared to outline now, but I hope later to offer a suggestion for meeting this difficulty.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the subject which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has been discussing is one of very great interest to every citizen of the country. There is one thing in connection with the guaranteed price for wheat which I am very glad to notice, and that is that so far as I know there is not a single Member of Congress who has any disposition to fail to go through with it and make good the guaranty contained in the proclamation made by the President. I listened with very great interest to the speech made by the gentleman from Minnesota. I am inclined to think there is a grave danger in the plan suggested by him. Personally I have held the opinion that if the Food Administration Grain Corporation had proper backing, if it were given plenty of money and were given a free hand to handle this crop, it could force a better price for the amount of grain shipped to Europe than the superficial examination of the trade conditions and stores of wheat throughout the world would now indicate. If we were to follow the plan suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], it would seem to me that we would simply capitulate, we would accept the prices that the European buyers would fix, which would mean that the Government would assume an increased financial burden and a much greater burden than there is need for.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course the gentleman has not overlooked the fact that the foreign consumer has another market to look to for his wheat.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have not overlooked that at all, but I tell you this: I think some have in the United States magnified these other possible sources where Europeans may get their supply. A good deal is made in the papers about the fact that there are large stores of wheat in Australia and large stores of wheat in Argentina, but those supplies are hardly available for Europe now, with the very great shortage in ship tonnage.

Mr. SNYDER. It is just as available as ours, only it takes a few days longer to get it there.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It takes three times as long.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, no; it does not take three times as long.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It takes 120 days to make the round trip from Australia.

Mr. SNYDER. The point I make is that there has always been a market for wheat outside of the United States, and we have to consider that in deciding what is going to be done with this question, and before you can determine what the loss is going to be under the Government guaranty we have to know something about what the other countries are going to charge for their wheat.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. We are never going to determine what the losses will be until we sell the wheat, but what the loss is going to be will depend upon the way in which we dispose of the question right here.

Mr. SNYDER. I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that all of the export markets, all of the market for the surplus of the world is outside of the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Of course they are outside of the United States, but if the gentlemen from Minnesota or any other man were standing at the port of shipment at New York with the entire supply of American wheat, and could absolutely control it, knowing the very great difficulty and almost impossible conditions of Europe getting its supplies because of the shortage of ship tonnage, from Australia and Argentina, I think he could force a better price. There is no use of becoming panicky about this. Some gentlemen are disposed to yell before they are hit. Our exportable balance of wheat this year is not likely to be more than from 250 to 350 millions and the National Treasury need not be made to stand the shrinkage in price upon more than that amount. If we were to follow Mr. ANDERSON'S plan, the loss might be figured on as high as 1,000,000,000 bushels. If the gentleman insists upon urging that plan, he is likely to scare away many friends in this House of the idea of making good the President's wheat guaranty.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think we can get better prices under the conditions I have outlined than if we were to capitulate at the start by following the suggested plan to settle with our farmers at the guaranteed price and the Government accept the loss every day as measured by the world's market price. That would be a surrender to my mind.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will recollect when he was making a statement of this kind some time ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, there is much of interest and no little uncertainty among the farmers of my district as to what we intend to do in reference to the guaranty. That is really a reflection, in their minds, upon the integrity of this Congress. The truth is that this law fixing the minimum price was made for just such a time as this. No other thought, I think, was in the minds of a majority of the Members of this House when that law was framed, and we have heard no suggestion on the part of any man that he would consider for a moment not living up to the promise we made to the farmer. I have had some little correspondence in reference to the matter, and just to-day I received a letter from a man—we are not a large wheat-growing country—who said that he had bought a tractor, even out in Indiana, where the farms are small; that the boys were gone; that they rented much land; had invested two or three thousand dollars; and in that particular locality the promise of a good crop is not very great; and he wanted to know what we were going to do about it. Of course, there is no disposition on the part of Congress not to fulfill the promise we made to the farmer. I was at a loss, a little bit, to understand the reasoning of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] when I understood him to say that there would be no purchasing corporation in the second plan——

Mr. ANDERSON. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that. Of course, I intended that the grain corporation would continue exercising the same function it does now, having the same power to buy and sell wheat that it has now with reference to the 1918 crop, and it would be in the market at all times to protect the interests of the Government in the maintenance of the price.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. That is really just a continuation of the present plan, rather than two distinct methods of sales, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the two plans fundamentally are entirely different——

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I agree with that.

Mr. ANDERSON. But both involve the same question and use the identical machinery. Of course, I want to see the machinery used that we have set up, but I want to see that machinery used to accomplish a different result.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Then, if I understand the gentleman, what would occur is this, that the grain corporation would continue and that it would have a fund at its disposal to protect the Government in maintaining prices.

Mr. ANDERSON. Exactly so.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And the problem then is whether the grain corporation ought to endeavor to hold the price at the point of the guarantee. I am very glad, indeed, I have that cleared up, because I was laboring under a misapprehension in connection with it. It would certainly be foolish for us not to make an appropriation to maintain the machinery we have in order that the Government should be protected.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BAER. And does not the gentleman think if we keep this machinery intact that the machinery should keep the restrictions on all the by-products and the manufactured products of the grain? For instance, I understand in Minnesota the other day the Food Department took off the restriction from bran and middlings of wheat, and the mills went up in their price from $26 to $46 a ton, and it went up $2 more the next day. While we are fixing the price for wheat and flour a lot of millers are obtaining extortionate prices for the by-products.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Well, evidently, if you hold the price high the by-products will be kept high. And it is a question as to how far we should go in controlling the selling. Now, I agree with the gentleman that it would be my judgment on the by-products, so far as middlings and bran are concerned, it would be wise to restrict them if we could; but, if I remember, subsidiary organizations were formed, and the farmer really never got the benefit of the restriction. So I am not sure that the Government, now that we are entering upon peace times, would be any more efficient than it was during war times, when the exigency was great upon us.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Just to find out how high the mountain ahead of us is, does the gentleman know what the wheat product of the Southern Hemisphere is? It is just being harvested now; and, as I understand, do we know practically how many bushels Australasia, South Africa, and South America are producing this year?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I do not know. I would be glad if the gentleman would inform me.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know. I just wanted to know how high the mountain is that is ahead of us.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The suggestion was made by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] that when the price is taken off the by-product is doubled in value the same day or the next day. Is there any assurance that that same thing would not occur if they would take the price off of wheat at the present time?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think the general opinion is that if the guaranteed price was taken off wheat, and I think it has been asserted here on the floor of the House, and by the honored chairman at one time not long ago, wheat would go to $1.25 a bushel.

Mr. BAER. If they had not fixed a price on it it would have gone to $5 or $6 a bushel. Mr. Hoover said that.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. There is no doubt, gentlemen, that the only two products whose price is restricted and not allowed to soar were the two products of wheat and wool.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the Food Administration fixed the price on cotton seed and on linters during the same time.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. They did it on linters, but I was not informed they did it on cotton seed. I know that cotton seed, which formerly ran from $5 to $8 a ton, went up to $75 or $80 a ton.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman does not want to be unfair.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. How high did it sell during the war?

Mr. BLACK. Before the United States entered the war we sold it as high as $60. Of course, cotton seed did go up. It is a vegetable fat, much needed, and it soared very rapidly.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I assure the gentleman I had no idea of provoking that sort of discussion. I mean to be absolutely fair.

Mr. BLACK. I am sure of that.

Mr. LEVER. My recollection is that when the price was fixed on cotton seed it was selling at $82 a ton.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And will the gentleman kindly inform me when the price was fixed?

Mr. LEVER. Shortly after the passage of the food-control act.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And what was the Government price?

Mr. LEVER. Seventy to seventy-one dollars a ton.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I may state to the gentleman that in my State it sold at $66 a ton.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I confess to the gentleman it will be very interesting to me to know the absolute facts on all of these questions. I think that any man who speaks here ought not to be willing to say what is not true as to the facts in the case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that the price of wheat was reduced 75 cents on the same day that they fixed the price at $2.25?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I know the price of wheat was ranging between $2.75 and $3 a bushel, and it was fixed at $2.20.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. But be that as it may, gentlemen, it seems to me that it would be utterly foolish for us to permit the organization, which is already effected, to lack an appropriation big enough at any time to control the buying in this country. It is, in my judgment, the only protection that the Government will have.

For if the Government should buy the whole crop at the $2.20 price per bushel and should then sell at the world's price, it will have lost nothing on the guarantee, and who is there that would say that such action on the part of the Government would not enhance the price, and thus save the Government from much of loss. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am sorry to change the subject that the committee is considering at this time, but I want to invite the attention of members of the committee to a matter that, in my judgment, is very important and which I think ought to be given attention.

I now want to speak about the manner in which claims against the United States are handled. Under the Constitution the United States may not be sued, yet claims are constantly arising against the United States—claims so meritorious that were an honest citizen in the place of the United States he would not rest until he had made settlement. The Government should do no less. The Government should be as honest as it wants its citizens to be. These claims arise and have arisen in a multitude of ways, and we have tried to meet them; but our whole system has been imperfect.

Early in the history of our country we recognized the obligation we owed to those who had fought our country's battles, and we passed laws making land grants as a sort of reward or compensation for services rendered. We did this by act of Congress. In this same connection we granted more favorable conditions under land laws to those whom the Government owed for military service. We have granted special consideration to them touching employment. Beyond that, and involving a vast expenditure, we have recognized the Nation's obligation or debt to our soldiers and those dependent upon them by a system of pensions more generous than has ever been devised by any other Government. Chiefly these grants have been provided for by general law, yet, too, largely by special act, and to-day thousands of individual pension cases receive the special attention of Congress.

But still other claims arose, and with the expanding business of the Government, the taking over by the Government of vast works that private interests had handled in earlier days, the liability of the Government increased. I shall not go into minute detail, but the expansion of Government activities and Government liabilities caused us to pass a few years ago the employees' compensation law, through which automatically claims of a certain class against the Government are adjusted without reference to Congress.

Again, we established the Court of Claims and provided that that court should hear certain causes referred to it from executive departments and from the Congress.

Yet, in spite of all this, the Congress finds itself called upon to consider at every session a multitude of claims. Some of the claims are large, some are small; and the merits of the claims are as wide apart as are the amounts different in size.

SAMPLES.

Let me mention to you a few clear-cut claims that may suggest the general demand that is made upon Congress along this line:

Case 1. The Government issues patent to a piece of land to A, an Indian, who was not required to make any improvements, and later issues patent to the same piece of land to B, a homesteader. B has made extensive improvements, built a house, fences, brought the land under cultivation, planted an orchard, lived upon the land for years. He has made a home. Yet in a court B's patent can be set aside or canceled, for the Government had no authority to issue it. Yet how about the Government's liability to B? The Government has committed an outrageous blunder. Surely liability exists.

Case 2. The Post Office Department awards C the contract to carry the mail on star route Y to Z for $1,500 per annum. C is told that bond will be adjusted as soon as possible, but in meantime he should go ahead with work. C does so, and sends in bond in a few weeks. Error is discovered and bond is returned to C. C's bondsmen discover that C has under bid and are delighted that bond is imperfect and refuse to renew it. C continues to carry mail for six months under direction of department till new contract is awarded to X. Then C is told that under the law he can not be paid, because his bond was imperfect. The Government owes him $700 that any honest man in the Government's place would pay at once.

Case 3. A Government department is about to build a public building at W. Before awarding building contract office arranges by a special contract with D to drive piling to test out character of foundation necessary at a cost of $125. By oral arrangement inspector is to be notified when D is ready for test and is to report at once. D performs his duty fully, inspector is notified, but delays reporting for four days. Contractor is paying $2.50 each to 4 laborers, who are to help with test, $10 per day. After four days' delay, inspector shows up. Government admits its fault but says it has no authority to pay D the $40 that he as an honest man has had to pay his workmen. Any honest man in the Government's place would pay D.

Case 4. The Government Forest Service, through the utter recklessness and carelessness on part of its employee or agent, and while the latter is doing official work for the Government, burns $1,000 worth of logs and telephone poles belonging to E. Any honest man in the Government's place would make full settlement at once with E.

Now, in all the above cases and others that I could mention, an honest claim has arisen against the Government—a claim so honest, so just, that if it were against any Member of this House settlement would be made at once.

PRESENT METHOD OF SETTLEMENT A SORRY STORY.

More than that, in each of the foregoing claims referred to the particular executive department under which the claim arose could not make settlement. The claims are recognized as just, and yet no settlement may be made under any general law. Moreover, the injured party may not sue the Government in any court. What shall B, C, D, and E do under the circumstances? Why, they take up the matter with their Representatives in Congress or their Senators. A bill is introduced, it is referred to a proper committee, and evidence is furnished. From that point on the progress of the matter is a sorry story. Each of the claims referred to above has been recommended favorably by the department in which it arose, each has been reported by a committee in the House or Senate from one to three or four different times. One of them has passed both House and Senate in different Congresses. No lack of diligence has existed on the part of the claimant or on the part of the Member of Congress in prosecuting the claims. Yet the claims are still unpaid. In one instance the claim is 10 years old. They are all on the calendar of the House to-day, the first one having been on the calendar since June 4, 1918. We simply have not had time to consider these small items in the stress of big matters. If a private individual were involved instead of the Government we would say he did not have time to be honest and pay his just debts. Let us not say that of our Government. Let us say, rather, that we are working under a most stupid system in the matter of claims of this character, and let us see if we can not work out a better system.

The claims above referred to involve amounts ranging from $40 to $750. Why, in any community in the country a court would direct a trustee or administrator of an estate to pay a claim that was as well authenticated and not contested by a living soul; or if the claim were in dispute between neighbors it would be tried before a justice of the peace in my State or in the district court. Yet here we say that since the Government is involved we shall ask 435 busy Representatives and 96 busy Senators to pass upon each claim. We ask, first of all, that busy committees of some 17 or 19 members shall consider each claim, and then after they have reported unanimously we ask that the claim be put on the calendars of the House or Senate, that it then be considered, if it ever can be reached, and then, if passed, that it run the same gauntlet in the other Chamber, and then go to the President for his approval. A $40 claim! Think of it. A claim that a justice of the peace or a jury—and a jury by a three-fourths vote in Idaho—would pass upon so satisfactorily that there would be no appeal in 9 cases out of 10 if it were between private citizens. Yet as it involves the Government, notwithstanding the fact that the Executive, under whom it arose, admits it, notwithstanding he would pay it, notwithstanding the evidence is overwhelming, and that a jury of 17 or 19 Members of this body, called a committee, say it is just and should be paid, why, we still can not pay it. The bill must pass Congress as though it were a $10,000,000 appropriation measure. And, gentlemen, it has gotten to the point that, with the pressure of tremendously important business, we do not have time to take up the calendar for the consideration of claims. I turn to the calendar of the House and find the dates claims were placed upon the calendar. Here is one dated March 20, 1918, another March 22, and so on. Yet the House has not even considered these bills.

Why, if you will pick up the calendar of the House for to-day you will see there are something like nine pages devoted to an itemized list of bills which are upon the Private Calendar. You will find there are something like three pages of bills which are upon the Unanimous-Consent Calendar and a large number of them are of private character. You will find that you have something like 200 separate bills of that character reported favorably from committees and awaiting action by the House.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS COMES FIRST.

Now, I am not going to urge that we have been following a policy that is wrong in considering the vast and important subjects of legislation that we have been considering during this most remarkable session of Congress which has crowded out of consideration the Private-Calendar bills.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not the cause of which the gentleman so justly complains, the delay of consideration, due more to the fact that a great majority of these private claims are absolutely without merit? Is not that the fact, and is not that the reason for the delay in getting action here through the regular way; that is, the Claims Committee, and through them action by the Congress?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, I would say to the gentleman that I realize that there are many worthless claims presented to the various committees for their consideration. The plan that I shall propose will at once weed out the worthless claims and take care of the just ones. I was upon one of the claims committees of the House for a couple of years and am on one of them now, and I realize that the work of the committee is in large part given over to sorting out worthless claims from those that are good, and yet at the same time it must be admitted that there are hundreds of meritorious claims where, if the gentleman from Texas himself were the one under obligation, he would settle those claims before he would go to bed to-night, because he would recognize their justice.

Mr. BAER. They probably would not get through committee if they were not meritorious.

Mr. FRENCH. No; not at all, generally speaking.

Mr. BLANTON. And they do not get through the committee.

Mr. FRENCH. The unworthy claims for the most part do not, and many of the worthy claims do not get through the committees. Yet we do not come to an end. Bad claims are presented year after year—the same claims, mind you—and we should have a system by which bad claims would be finally disposed of and good claims promptly paid.

Now, gentlemen, it is an outrageous way to treat our citizens. One of the cases I referred to by way of illustration is that of an old man nearly 70 years of age. His claim has been reported at least three times unanimously by a committee of the House or Senate. It has passed the House and the Senate at different Congresses. It is now on the calendar. The department wants to pay it, but the law is so narrow it may not be done. Now, I submit such treatment does not make for good feeling toward our country. Such treatment makes discontent and arouses outraged feelings. Such treatment helps to make Bolshevists. It helps to make anarchists.

I have seen normally law-abiding men do criminal acts when they have been the victims of an injury, and so have you. And lawlessness is anarchy. Gentlemen, we are asking that our people be honest—that they pay their debts. Yet it is commonly said that it is most impossible for a little fellow to collect a claim from the Government, no matter how just.

THE REMEDY.

Now, what is the remedy? Well, we have done a few things that suggest an answer. When we undertook the construction of the Panama Canal, the operation of the railroad, steamship lines, and so forth, we knew accidents would occur just as they occur for other employers of labor, and that the employer—this time the Government—would sometimes be at fault. So we passed the employees' compensation act of May 30, 1908. Under that act, almost automatically are adjusted claims against the Government. The law has worked admirably.

But this is not all we have done. On September 7, 1916, we passed a more general compensation act for settlement of claims against the Government arising out of employment.

But we have gone further. In the War Risk Insurance act of 1917 we applied the same principle to those in the service of the Government who might sustain injury by reason of such service.

Beyond that we have gone. A few days ago we passed a bill through the House providing that the Secretary of War should have the right to adjudicate contracts arising in the present war, aggregating something like $2,700,000,000, that were in various stages of completion, but had not been perfected. In other words, we gave to the War Department the power largely to adjudicate those claims.

Now, I submit that we should apply a similar principle in disposing of the miscellaneous claims that arise against the Government.

In the case of the bill we passed a few days ago authorizing the Secretary of War to adjudicate contracts we met a demand from every State in this Union. But, gentleman, no matter how just the claims may be that will be adjudicated, not one of them will be found more just, more deserving, than that of the poor old man in Idaho who carried the mail 10 years ago for the Government and has not been paid a single penny for his services. Not one will be more just than that of the homesteader who, through a blunder of some Land Office official or official of the Indian Bureau, was permitted to live for years and improve as a homestead a piece of land that had been patented to an Indian, only to be told by the Government to "Get out" after he had received patent and supposed he had builded a home for himself and family.

What, then, do I propose? I propose as a solution of this question that we authorize every executive department of the Government to adjudicate and make settlement of every claim arising in such department. Since the Government of the United States can not be sued, we can say what shall constitute final action. I would have the action of the secretary of the particular department final in the case of any claim up to, say, $2,000. Then I would provide in claims larger than that that there might be an appeal, an appeal either on the part of the Government or on the part of the claimant, to the Court of Claims; or possibly you could provide that an appeal be taken, if you want to call it that, to Congress itself in the larger cases. I would also provide that claims be presented within a reasonable time after injury occurred.

Surely, this is a reasonable solution. Gentlemen, if a little question arose in your community involving $40 or $750 you would be perfectly willing to trust the disposition of the case to the justice of the peace or to the court that has the smallest jurisdiction. In my State a justice of the peace has jurisdiction of cases up to $300, or the district court in amounts over that. You would possibly waive a jury, and if you did not a jury, not unanimously, but by a three-fourths vote, would bring in a verdict that in nine cases out of ten would commend itself to the approval of both parties to the litigation, and there would not be an appeal. The case would be settled.

But what shall we say of cases where both sides agree? What shall we say of cases, for instance, that would come before the probate court where a person comes in with a claim and the administrator of the estate says, "Yes; I recognize the justice of the claim and I want to pay it"? Who would say that the probate court in any State of this country would refuse to order that the bill be paid if that were the proper procedure to follow in his particular jurisdiction? Yet that is precisely what is occurring in all these cases that I have brought to your attention, cases in which not only the claimant asserts the justice of the claim and furnishes proof overwhelming, but where the Government, through the department where the claim arose, admits the justice of the claim but can not pay it for lack of authority in law.

WHAT WILL BE GAINED?

Now what would be gained by the plan that I propose?

First. There would be a speedy adjustment of claims against the Government.

Second. Fictitious claims would be turned down and would not come in hoary with age as their chief measure of merit.

Third. There would be orderly procedure.

Fourth. The claims would be disposed of by the department having the facts before it.

Fifth. Claims that should be disposed of by one competent department head and that in civil procedure are disposed of by justices of the peace would not need to challenge and engross the attention not of one Member of Congress and not of one committee but of 435 busy Members of the House and 96 Senators as well as the attention of the department where the claim arose, and finally the President.

Sixth. The Senators and Representatives would have more time for the large and important legislative problems.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just 12 years ago to-day I had the honor and privilege of addressing the Fifty-ninth Congress on the merits of the general Agricultural appropriation bill, which was then up for consideration. I had been elected to fill out the unexpired term caused by the death of Hon. Rufus E. Lester, and this was my first appearance before this body of American legislators. I had occasion then to criticize Congress for the parsimonious policy adopted by our Government toward the great agricultural classes. The bill under discussion carried an appropriation of only $9,000,000. This bill carries an appropriation of $31,000,000, to be wisely and judicially expended for the promotion of the interests of the American farmer, and I desire to congratulate the country upon the fact that we have at last come to regard agriculture in the proper light—the foundation stone upon which rests all our material greatness. I shall be glad to support this bill, and I hope there will be no material changes in it when it finally passes the House.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some observations on a different line. I had hoped that it would not become necessary for me to make these remarks, but I have patiently waited for some other Member on our side of the House to answer the charges that I shall undertake to answer, but thus far no one has come forward to make a reply. I much preferred that some Member longer in the service would perform the duty that I shall endeavor to perform.

At the outset I desire to state that I hold no brief for the President nor his administration. I am not the authorized spokesman for the National Democratic Party. I do not pretend to represent the views of a majority of the Members on my side of the House, but I am the Representative of my district and have a right to speak for them.

The Republican Party has controlled this Government so long that they feel that they have a right and title to it by prescription. They seem to look upon the Democratic Party as mere trespassers without even a color of title to the offices from the President down. The people of this country may well congratulate themselves upon the fact that President Wilson has occupied the White House during the past six years, the most memorable and exciting in our country's history. There seems to have been an effort on the part of the Republican Party to weaken his influence from the beginning of his first presidential term. No President of this country has ever had to deal with as many grave and complicated questions as President Wilson has had to meet and dispose of. For weeks and weeks I have sat silent in my seat, expecting some Member on this side of the House to defend him and his administration against certain charges. It seems to me that some of the leaders on the other side have endeavored to block and thwart the purposes of the President in a great many instances. They have tried to amend a number of important war measures in order to take from the President some of the power and authority carried in the bills. This, of course, would have emasculated the bills, and those Members attempting to pass these amendments knew it at that time. I refer especially to the Food Administration bill, where it was attempted to pass an amendment creating a commission of three to perform the work and duties that have been so admirably performed by Mr. Hoover.

Another instance is where it was attempted to create a commission practically to carry on the war and to take out of the hands of the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the power and authority lodged in him by the Constitution of the United States.

In the President's last address before Congress, just before his departure for Europe, you endeavored to embarrass him. In the course of his speech, when he made the statement that he himself proposed to attend the peace conference, our side of the House arose en masse and applauded him, but you remained in your seats like statues of stone to show to him and to testify to the world in no uncertain manner your disapproval of his course.

It seems to me that there has not been that full cooperation that should have existed, especially when this country has been engaged in war. And yet I have recently heard prominent Members on the other side of the House charge that if an extra session of Congress should become necessary the Democratic side of the House was responsible for it. Why should we want an extra session of Congress? We know that the President desires and the country desires that all the appropriation bills should be passed before the 4th of March, and we are making every effort in our power to have these bills passed before that time; but, as I have already stated, Members on the other side have had the temerity, and even the effrontery, to charge this side of the House with an effort to delay the passage of these important measures.

Why should we desire an extra session of Congress? Would we prefer a Republican Speaker to a Democratic Speaker? Would we prefer a Republican majority to a Democratic majority? Would we prefer to see the offices appertaining to this House, from the Clerk down to the smallest paid employee, filled by persons of the opposite political faith? To ask these questions answers them. We are not in favor of an extra session, and we hope that an extra session may not be necessary.

Not only have the Members of this House and others holding public office attempted to annoy the President and embarrass his administration, but citizens in private life who have enjoyed the highest office in the gift of the American people have contributed their portion toward making the road thorny for the President to travel.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will not the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would be glad if my friend would specify the things in which the President has been hampered by this side of the House. The gentleman makes a general charge. Let him state specific measures.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not attempt to enumerate all the measures, but particularly do I mention the Food Administration bill. When this bill came up for a vote, the Republicans sought to amend it by creating a commission, and thus take from the President the power and authority mentioned in the bill of designating some one to act for him, and it is well known to everybody that should this bill pass Mr. Hoover would be nominated as the Food Administrator. And there are other measures, but I can not take the time to enumerate them.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman states that all of us undertook to create a food commission.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; I did not say all of you.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to say that the members of the committee worked hand in hand, the Republican members with the Democratic members of that committee, and we aided in every way that we possibly could, and that the suggestions which were adopted came from the Republicans as much as they did from the Democrats, and met with the approval of the administration.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me, I have not a moment's further time to yield him, and he is allowing his time to be consumed by others.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am sorry, gentlemen, but I can not yield any more. Now, what is true, some of you have voted for these measures, because you knew your constituents would defeat you for reelection if you did not support them. Some of you, I am persuaded, voted for them grudgingly, but you felt compelled to vote as you did, because you represented the views of your constituents.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say this——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not yield any more, as I have but a few minutes left. Mr. Chairman, up to a few weeks ago the greatest representative the Republican Party ever had, living or dead, contributed weekly to the Kansas City Star editorials that were calculated to embarrass the President in his conduct of the war and in his great undertaking to unite and organize the peoples of the earth into a league of nations to prevent the recurrence of future wars.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not want to take the gentleman's time, but I know he wants to be fair——

Mr. OVERSTREET. All I ask is just to let me finish the sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Georgia are out of order, and the gentleman from Missouri has made the point of no quorum.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, as one Member of this House, I do not intend to sit here while insults are being heaped upon a distinguished citizen——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask that the gentleman permit me to conclude the sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri must either make or withdraw his point of no quorum.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman from Georgia will refrain from attacking ex-President Roosevelt and the Members on this side, I will not insist upon a point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I assure the gentleman that he can find no fault with my statement if the House will permit me to complete the sentence. I said the greatest representative of the Republican Party ever had, living or dead, up to a few weeks ago, contributed weekly to the Kansas City Star articles that were calculated to embarrass the President in the prosecution of the war and his great undertaking to unite and organize the peoples of the earth into a league of nations to prevent the recurrence of future wars, and I want it clearly and distinctly understood that I am not attempting to minimize one particle the wonderful achievements of the great ex-President, and far be it from my purpose to reflect in the slightest upon the character or memory of the illustrious dead; but I feel it is my duty to call the attention of this House to every human agency or instrumentality that has been at work during the past six years to weaken or diminish the influence and power of President Wilson in the estimation of the people, both at home and abroad.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman, for I know he wants to be fair. The gentleman has charged this side of the House with cowardice.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, I have not.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman said that we did not dare to vote otherwise than for these bills, because we were afraid we would be defeated in the election. The question has been submitted to the American people and the returns would indicate that the position taken by the gentleman is not well taken.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; you went before the people for reelection, and in Kansas and in Nebraska and in the other western States you told the people that the Democratic Party had acted unfairly, that they had fixed the price of wheat and refused to fix the price of cotton. In the New England and Northern States you said the South was in the saddle. Your majority was won by making appeals to the passions and prejudices of the people by declaring that the South was in the saddle and controlled and dominated the national democratic administration. Now, recently the National Republican Committee met in Chicago to lay their plans for the next presidential election, and, judging from an account of the proceedings of this committee, the South will be your chief target of attack. The poisoned missiles of your misrepresentation and abuse will be aimed at—in the language of a member of that committee—"one corner of the country," a reference to the South made contemptuously by Gov. Harding, of Iowa. I hold in my hand a copy of an article from the Washington Post, dated January 11, the day after this National Republican Committee met, and it seems that the burden of their song was to criticize and malign the South. Gov. Beeckman, of Rhode Island, a member of the committee, said that the people of the North were tired of paying 90 per cent of the taxes and having it expended by a minority of the South, which dominated the national democratic administration; and Gov. Harding, of Iowa, said that this is too big and too great a country to be ruled by one corner of it.

Now, gentleman, I submit that I am disappointed at the membership of the Republican National Committee. I would have thought that that committee would be composed of broad-minded statesmen who are too big to cast any slurs upon the South, especially since it has been more than 50 years since the great Civil War, which left the South naked and destitute. But I am glad to say, Mr. Chairman, that she has recovered from that destitution and nakedness, and such a recuperation the world has never seen before and I doubt if it ever will again.

In the beautiful words of Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, from an article recently appearing in the Washington Post:

> Yet this South paid her share of the Government debts, bore her burdens, sent her boys to die in the Spanish-American War—from San Juan to Santiago in Cuba, from Manila to Zamboanga in the Philippines. She sent her boys to France, cheering for the flag of the Union, and for America they died and sleep in unmarked mounds in France in every vale and riverside, from the English Channel to the Rhine. Who is there to say of these people that because once or twice in 50 years their northern and western brethren granted them some of the places of honor in the Government they should be the objects of national political party vengeance?

What we need, Mr. Chairman, is broad-minded patriotism; sectional feeling and prejudice should be cast aside. What we now want is confidence in the wisdom of our delegates at the peace conference in France to give to the world a lasting peace—confidence in the parties to the contract, confidence in our great Government at Washington, and confidence in the President of the United States, confidence in each other and ourselves. Do not rock the boat but "stand by" your great captain, who will steer the old ship of state into a haven of safety at last.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, all I care to say is this: The question was submitted to the American people, and if the gentleman is satisfied with the results we certainly are, for we have no complaint to make.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, briefly, along the line that I talked about.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa if he has anyone present ready to go on.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have used more time than the gentleman from South Carolina has, and it was understood that we would rise after the gentleman finished.

Mr. LEVER. May I inquire how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has 60 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Iowa 53 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought there was a distinct agreement that general debate should proceed until 9 o'clock, with the provision that one hour should then be used to-morrow at such time as the House resolved itself into the committee again for the consideration of this bill. That was my understanding.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is not quite right about that. The understanding was that we would proceed for three hours, at which time the committee would rise, and that we would then give way to the Appropriations Committee to bring up a deficiency appropriation bill to-morrow, which would leave us still one hour of general debate. Certain gentlemen to whom I have promised time are unavoidably absent. That is true also with respect to the gentleman from Iowa. While they ought to be here, yet they are not here, and I do not want to shut them out, because I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is not going to have any general debate at all upon his bill, other than his own opening statement. It is just a matter of trying to keep good faith with these men.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought there was a very distinct understanding on the part of the Members of the House that the general debate should proceed for three hours.

Mr. LEVER. That is true; but the gentleman recognizes this fact——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is going to delay the passage of the appropriation bill further.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, I can not prevent the gentleman from making a motion to rise, but I shall vote against it. I have remained here, as have many others, with the understanding that what I state was agreed to. There could not possibly be a misunderstanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no agreement. It was merely an assertion on the part of the chairman that he would make that effort.

Mr. HAUGEN. Objection was made against that agreement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We innocent bystanders always believe in the statements made by the chairman and the ranking Members, and we have remained here. I would have gone long ago if it had not been for that understanding.

Mr. LEVER. We have consumed two hours and 20 minutes, and it will make a difference of about 40 minutes. If it is necessary, of course, I can send for these Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why not go on with the debate now?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will withhold that for a moment——

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I made very diligent effort to reach a member of my committee, to whom I had allotted 15 minutes of time. I happen to know that the gentleman left the hall believing that he would be able to take his time when we met again, and I know that the gentleman is not very well. I have not been able to locate him, so that we have run out of soap just now, and I do not feel, in justice to these gentlemen, who think they are going to have time, that they should be denied the opportunity all for the sake of saving 40 minutes in debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? The agreement or the statement was made with a full membership, or as nearly a full membership as we ever have present.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I recognize——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Who is to speak?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were—ayes 9, noes 1.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15018, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee report from the Pension Bureau, appearing in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, be printed as a House document and that a short letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, read to-day from the Clerk's desk, be printed as a preface to the document.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman from Texas if he has taken up this matter with the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. BARNHART]?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from South Carolina that this is a report of a special committee of experts from the Pension Office appointed by Commissioner Saltzgaber a short while ago to report on the various companies of Indian fighters in Texas, as to which of them are entitled to the benefits of the act of March 4, 1917, and which are not. It will save a great deal of correspondence for the 18 Members of Congress from Texas in answering inquiries——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I think I recall this matter was before the House before, and I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he defer his request until the chairman of the Committee on Printing is present.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the Committee on Printing has made no objection to it.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit, there was some gentleman who objected to this same request this morning.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does he consent now?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know; he is not present.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, I think it would hardly be fair to take it up to-night——

Mr. LEVER. I object, Mr. Speaker, for the time being, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes had it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. One gentleman has arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will withhold for a moment——

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold for a moment.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order. It does not require a quorum to adjourn.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order it does not require a quorum to adjourn.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a division on the vote to adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order it is too late; the gentleman has already demanded the yeas and nays and the yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. BLANTON. A decision has not been made by the Chair, and I ask for a division on the question to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Division is demanded. The question is, Shall the House now adjourn?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not require a quorum to adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Tuesday, January 28, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of New Buffalo Harbor, Mich. (H. Doc. No. 1730); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War, chairman of the committee of the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater Commission, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the care and maintenance of the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater, Arlington National Cemetery, Va., fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1731); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, father of our spirits, the source of our freedom, the defender of our liberties, we come before Thee to ask Thy guidance and blessing as we seek to maintain the precious inheritance that has been passed to us from our fathers and to advance the interests of Thy kingdom. We pray that we may have the satisfaction of knowing that we are God's chosen men, directed in paths to the fulfillment of God's great purpose in us as a Nation. To this end do Thou endue us plenteously with heavenly wisdom, and give us Thy guidance and blessing for the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

GERMAN PROPAGANDA—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a matter in the nature of a question of personal privilege. This morning there appeared in the Washington Post a statement by the Secretary of War. I will ask the Secretary to read the headlines and the first two paragraphs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

REPUDIATED BY BAKER.—A. STEVENSON'S "PACIFIST" LIST DENOUNCED BY SECRETARY—NOT WITH WAR DEPARTMENT—SENATE WITNESS CONNECTED WITH NEW YORK INTELLIGENCE BUREAU—"GERMAN PROPAGANDA" LIST, SAYS SECRETARY. CONTAINS NAMES OF PEOPLE OF DISTINCTION AND UNQUESTIONED LOYALTY—DISCLAIMED ALSO BY STATE DEPARTMENT—MANY TELEGRAMS OF PROTEST.

[By Albert W. Fox.]

The investigation which the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary is conducting of pro-German propaganda took on a new aspect yesterday when Secretary of War Baker came boldly to the defense of some of the so-called pacifists whose names were contained on a list prepared by Archibald Stevenson, understood to be representing the military intelligence department. Mr. Baker denounced the list and repudiated the suggestion that Mr. Stevenson represented any branch of the War Department. He issued the following statement:

"I am receiving telegrams and letters with regard to a list of persons handed to the Senate committee by Mr. Archibald Stevenson, who is represented in newspaper accounts as a member of the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department. Mr. Stevenson has never been an officer or an employee of the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in answer to that, I ask the Secretary to read the statement I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"I assume the Secretary of War in his statement published in the press this morning did not intend to criticize the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, charged with the investigation of German propaganda. Whether he approves of the method adopted by the committee or not is a matter of no concern to the committee. But when he undertakes to repudiate and escape responsibility for a witness called by that committee at the instance of one of the branches of the War Department his statement can not be permitted to go unchallenged.

"The facts are these: Secretary Baker declares that 'Mr. Stevenson has never been an officer or an employee of the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department.'

"This committee never heard of Mr. Stevenson until his name was called to the attention of the committee in a communication from the office of Military Intelligence, War Department, New York City, dated December 17, 1918, addressed to the Director of Military Intelligence, Washington, D. C., which communication, with a notation to rush, was delivered by the office of the Director of Military Intelligence, Washington, D. C., to this committee, and the portion thereof relating to Mr. Stevenson reads as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF MILITARY INTELLIGENCE,
"ROOM NO. 806, 302 BROADWAY,
"New York City, December 17, 1918.

"From: Office M. I. D., 302 Broadway, New York.
"To: Director of Military Intelligence, Washington, D. C.
"Subject: Senate inquiry.

"1. It is respectfully suggested that the following witnesses be called to testify before the Senate inquiry:

* * * * * * *

"Archibald Ewing Stevenson, of the propaganda section, who has studied German propaganda in the United States for over a year and concentrated on the subject, and is probably more familiar with the various interlocking groups of German and radical propagandists in the United States at this time than anyone else.

* * * * * * *

"JOHN B. TRAVOR,
"Captain, U. S. A."

"It is evident that the Secretary of War did not familiarize himself with the employees of his department or the work which was being done by the Bureau of Military Intelligence."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the original letter that came to the committee, signed by Capt. Travor. Senators will notice this pink slip of paper inscribed "Rush." The letter was rushed to the committee, calling our attention to this man Stevenson, asserting that he had been in the department for a year studying German propaganda and was the man who should be brought before our committee. With that pink slip there was another slip of a different color—I do not know why they use different colors—also containing the inscription "Rush." It was rushed to me, and after getting this letter, as I have set forth in the statement read by the Secretary, I subpœnaed Mr. Stevenson. He came before us and testified that he had been employed by the War Department, knew all about this matter, and would give us some very valuable testimony. So the Secretary of War, under the circumstances, it seems to me, ought to have made some investigation before he gave out the statement appearing in the newspaper.

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDINGS (S. DOC. NO. 362).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department buildings, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriations in the sum of $507,624 required for salaries and expenses of buildings under his supervision for the fiscal year 1920, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. Smith, its chief clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 390. An act to establish the Grand Canyon National Park, in the State of Arizona; and

S. 5318. An act granting a pension to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona petitioning Congress to pass the woman suffrage amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana petitioning Congress to pass the woman suffrage amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a house joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Arizona favoring the passage of the constitutional amendment granting the right of suffrage to women. As it comes from the legislature of a State, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. Otherwise I would not ask to have it so printed.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF ARIZONA.

MIT SIMMS,
Secretary of State.
By R. E. MCGILLEN,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I also present senate memorial 2 from the Legislature of the State of Arizona, touching the publicity of the returns of income taxes, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE CHAMBER, STATEHOUSE,
PHOENIX, ARIZ.

Senate memorial 2.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the State Senate of the Fourth Legislature of the State of Arizona respectfully represents that—

Whereas the assignment of quotas to raise funds for various war purposes, such as the sale of liberty bonds, war savings stamps, Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, and similar purposes, during the recent war waged by the Government of the United States against the Imperial German Government, has shown the necessity of having some definite means of ascertaining the wealth of citizens other than the means of popular estimation; and

Whereas unjust hardships have been inflicted upon certain citizens of our State by compelling them to subscribe more than they could really afford to the various war activities, and in some instances citizens have been penalized for not subscribing what some arbitrary individual or committee thought they should subscribe; and

Whereas other citizens who were well fixed in this world's goods failed miserably to subscribe more than a pittance for war purposes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fourth Legislature of the State of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urged to enact any legislation that may be necessary to make "income-tax returns" public records; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this memorial be sent to Arizona's Senators and Representative in Congress, and that they be respectfully requested to use their every influence and all the power at their command to accomplish the enactment of such legislation.

Passed the senate January 21, 1919, by the following vote—16 ayes, 3 excused.

A. A. JOHNS,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

L. F. SWEETING,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I present a memorial to the United States Senate from the Legislature of Montana upon the passage of the resolution for a suffrage constitutional amendment. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 1.

A memorial to the Senate of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification, extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America.

To the honorable SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

Your memorialists, the members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas it appears that a majority of the people of the United States of America are in favor of extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America, and,

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States a measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution designed to effect such extension of suffrage; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house (the Senate concurring), That we, the members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby petition and earnestly pray the Senate of the United States that such measure proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution so extending the right of suffrage be passed and submitted to the several States for ratification; and

Resolved further, That a copy of of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate of the United States, and that copies hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Montana Senators in the Congress of the United States.

(Signed) O. W. BELDEN,
Speaker of the House.
(Signed) J. E. EDWARDS,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

Approved January 23, 1919:
(Signed) S. V. STEWART, Governor.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, C. T. Stewart, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house joint memorial No 1, "A memorial to the Senate of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification, extending the right of suffrage to the women citizens of the United States of America," enacted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, and approved by S. V. Stewart, governor of said State, this 23d day of January, 1919.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State. Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 23d day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.] C. T. STEWART, Secretary of State.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to have a telegram read embodying a resolution of the Kansas Legislature.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., January 28, 1919.

HON. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Both Houses of the Kansas Legislature unanimously passed the following concurrent resolution:

"Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a constitutional amendment providing for national woman suffrage; and

"Whereas it is an acknowledged fact that the enfranchisement of the women of Kansas has worked satisfactorily and tended toward better government in the State; and

"Whereas equality and justice to all people, for which the nations of the world have been struggling and for which the great war has been waged, requires the granting of suffrage to American women who, equally with the men of this country, have borne the burden of the war and have loyally and ungrudgingly given their sons and their personal services that liberty might live and the world be made free to the end that our own Government might not perish: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States is most earnestly requested to, without delay, pass the Federal amendment giving the women of the United States full suffrage."

HENRY J. ALLEN, Governor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have received a communication from the secretary of state of the State of South Dakota, transmitting a certified copy of a concurrent resolution passed by the legislature of that State relating to inundated lands in Charles Mix County. I ask that the communication and accompanying resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The communication and accompanying resolution were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Pierre, January 24, 1919.

HON. ED. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to hand you herewith certified copy of concurrent resolution, which originated in the house of representatives and is concurred in by the senate, relating to inundated lands in Charles Mix County, said inundation being caused by the overflow of certain wells, and requesting the Congress of the United States at its next session to appropriate a sufficient sum to reimburse the owners of said lands.

Will you please give the matter your careful attention?

Very truly, yours,

C. A. BURKHART,
Secretary of State.

Certificate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

I, C. A. Burkhart, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the annexed bill, to wit, house concurrent resolution, was duly passed by the sixteenth session of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, and that the same is now in full force and effect.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of South Dakota, at the city of Pierre, January 24, 1919.

[SEAL.] C. A. BURKHART,
Secretary of State.

HON. C. A. BURKHART,
Secretary of State:

The following concurrent resolution has been adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring)—

Whereas Congress has at various times appropriated funds for the purpose of sinking four flowing artesian wells on the border of a certain meandered lake known as Lake Andes, and located in the county of Charles Mix and State of South Dakota, for the purpose of furnishing water and fish for the Indians; and

Whereas the level of said lake has been raised several feet by the continuous flow of water discharged from the above-mentioned wells, causing the water to inundate large areas of valuable surveyed and patented agricultural land adjacent to the said lake, and that the lands so submerged are rendered worthless thereby to the owners thereof for either agricultural or grazing purposes, and that there are at least 1,500 acres of such land so submerged, and that the damage to these lands by said inundation or overflow is not less than $100 per acre, and that the owners of said lands are justly entitled to full compensation for such damage from the Government of the United States, by whose authority the said wells were sunk which caused the submergence or overflow of said lands: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of Representatives concurring), We earnestly though respectfully request the Congress of the United States at its next session to appropriate a sufficient sum to reimburse said overflowed land owners.

For the house:

LEWIS BENSON,
Speaker.
WRIGHT TARBELL,
Chief Clerk.

For the senate:

C. S. AMSDEN,
President pro tempore.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary.

Dated at Pierre, S. Dak., this 22d day of January, A. D. 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 3.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Government of the United States required war equipment and supplies which could not be produced without chromite; and

Whereas the urgent need for ships for military purposes cut off the supplies from abroad upon which this country previously had depended; and

Whereas the Government, through its departments and war boards at Washington, advertised this great need for chromite by issuing circulars, bulletins, and letters urging the people to search for, to mine, and to deliver chromite ore; and

Whereas a large number of Oregon miners, most of whom are men of small means, responded freely to these Government advertisements by building roads and trails, making open cuts and otherwise developing chromite mines and preparing to furnish this mineral to the Government, and who will be financially ruined unless relief comes immediately; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to supplement an act of Congress approved October 5, 1918 (Public, No. 220), and to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, from the funds appropriated by said act, to determine, to adjust, and pay losses sustained by investments preparatory to production of war minerals mentioned in said act." Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House concurring), That the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon favor the enactment by Congress of Senate bill 5234, and to that end the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the United States from the State of Oregon are hereby urged to use their influence in behalf of the passage of said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the Senate of Oregon be directed to transmit by mail a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Oregon in Congress.

Adopted by the house January 20, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 16, 1919.

W. J. VINTON,
President of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The joint memorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 8.

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States an act "to provide revenue, and for other purposes," commonly known as the 1918 revenue bill; that section 628 of this bill as passed the House of Representatives contained a provision in section 628 thereof authorizing the collection of a tax of 20 per cent of the selling price on all fruit and berry juices produced in the United States, according to a ruling of the Treasury Department of the United States in construing a similar provision in the revenue act of October 4, 1917; and

Whereas said provision of the bill was amended by the Senate of the United States so as to except from the operation thereof fruit and berry juices, and afterwards passed by said body as amended; and

Whereas a conference committee appointed by each House of Congress is now considering the amendment as adopted by the United States Senate, and, according to information received by the manufacturers of loganberry and apple juices in this State, intends to submit a report to each House of Congress recommending that the bill be amended so as to impose a tax of 10 per cent of the selling price of such fruit and berry juices; and

Whereas the imposition of such a tax would render valueless great manufacturing industries which have been built up in the States of Oregon, Washington, and elsewhere at a cost of vast sums of money; and

Whereas a large portion of the most fertile agricultural land in the Northwest is now devoted to the growth and culture of loganberries and apples, which are manufactured into loganberry and apple juices, thereby giving permanent employment to thousands of our citizens, which could not continue under the burdens of such tax; and

Whereas the taxation of the loganberry and apple juices as contemplated by said revenue bill, and the consequent destruction of our manufacturing and agricultural industries, would deprive this State of giving employment to the returning soldiers, sailors, and marines now in the service of their country; and

Whereas loganberry and apple juices as manufactured in the Northwest are food products rather than beverages, and therefore should not be classified with synthetic concoctions, such as root beer, ginger ale, pop, etc., as is proposed by said pending bill:

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, memorialized and requested to use their utmost endeavors to procure the passage of said revenue bill with the elimination of loganberry and apple juices from taxation therein as passed by the Senate of the United States; that copies of this concurrent resolution be forthwith forwarded to each member of the conference committee of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress, and also copies to the Senators and Representatives from the States of Oregon and Washington.

Adopted by the house January 22, 1919.

SEYMOUR JONES,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 21, 1919.

W. J. VINTON,
President of the Senate.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF NEW YORK.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2124) to fix the salary of the United States district attorney for the eastern district of New York, reported it without amendment.

ASSISTANT CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 424, submitted by Mr. OVERMAN on the 27th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the authority given to the Committee on the Judiciary by S. Res. 325, agreed to October 24, 1918, to employ an assistant clerk at a salary not to exceed $5 per diem, for a period not to exceed four months, be, and the same is hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

AGNES KELLEY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 427, submitted by Mr. THOMPSON (for Mr. SMITH of Maryland) on the 27th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Agnes Kelley, widow of John N. Kelley, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. POMERENE. I present an amendment to Senate resolution 415. I ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved further, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee or subcommittees or members thereof, duly authorized by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, be, and they are hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to investigate fully the statements of facts, charges, and allegations contained in the communication of Mr. Truman H. Newberry by Mr. J. O. Murfin, his attorney at law and in fact, dated January 23, 1919, and presented to the Senate of the United States on January 27, 1919, as appears of record, relating to the election of a United States Senator on November 5, 1918, and to make report thereon to the Senate as early as may be, and from time to time, if they deem best, submit to the Senate all the teestimony and the results of these said hearings thereon.

And for the purposes herein contained there is hereby conferred upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, or any subcommittee or subcommittees or members thereof, all the powers, privileges, and duties hereby conferred upon them in this resolution, relating to the petition filed with the Senate by Mr. Henry Ford contesting the election of Mr. Truman H. Newberry.

And the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputy are hereby required to attend the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, and to execute their directions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 5468) granting a pension to Benjamin A. Sturtevant with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5469) granting a pension to Annie Manchester, with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

EDUCATION OF ILLITERATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I introduce a bill providing for the education of native illiterates, of persons unable to understand or use the English language, and of other resident persons of foreign birth, which I ask to have printed in full in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (S. 5464) to promote the education of native illiterates, of persons unable to understand and use the English language, and of other resident persons of foreign birth; to provide for cooperation with the States in the education of such persons in the English language, the fundamental principles of government and citizenship, the elements of knowledge pertaining to self-support and home making, and in such other work as will assist in preparing such illiterates and foreign-born persons for successful living and intelligent American citizenship, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Education and in cooperation with any other Federal agencies which may be able through their existing organizations to furnish assistance therein, is hereby authorized and directed to cooperate with the several States in the education of illiterates, of persons unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, and of other resident persons of foreign birth, and in the training and preparation of teachers, supervisors, and directors for such educational work.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of cooperating with the several States in paying the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of the educational work herein there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the several States and subject to the provisions of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $5,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and annually thereafter until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, the sum of $12,500,000.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of cooperating with the several States in preparing teachers, supervisors, and directors for educational work under this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the several States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $250,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and annually thereafter until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, the sum of $750,000 annually.

SEC. 4. That any State may secure the benefits of this act by acceptance of its provisions and by the designation of an appropriate official to act as custodian of moneys allotted and by authorizing its department of education or chief school officer to cooperate with the United States in the educational work herein authorized, and after June 30, 1919, the appropriation herein made shall be available only in the event that each State or municipal corporation thereof acting through or in conjunction with the State shall appropriate, make available, and use for such educational work an amount equal to that allotted by the United States: Provided, That no State shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of this act until it shall by appropriate legislation require the instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum of all illiterate minors or minors unable to speak, read, or write the English language more than 16 years of age at schools or places or by other methods of elementary instruction until such minors have completed a course in English generally equivalent to that supplied by third-grade schools: Provided further, That no money authorized to be appropriated by the preceding sections of this act or appropriated by any of the States to carry out its provisions shall be authorized to be used for any other purpose than for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of education or for the preparation and training of such teachers.

SEC. 5. That the sums herein authorized to be appropriated shall be apportioned to the several States annually in the proportion which the total number of resident illiterate persons 10 years of age and over and of persons 10 years of age and over unable to speak the English language in that State bears to the total number of illiterate resident persons 10 years of age and over and of persons 10 years of age and over unable to speak the English language in the United States, exclusive of the District of Columbia, according to the last published preceding United States census.

SEC. 6. That in order to secure the benefits of this act each State, acting through its proper board or officer, shall submit to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval plans showing the manner in which it is proposed that the appropriation shall be used, including the kind of instruction and equipment to be provided, courses of study, methods of instruction, qualifications of teachers, supervisors, and directors, and the kind of schools in which and the conditions under which training of teachers, supervisors, and directors is to be given.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain whether the several States are using or are prepared to use the money allotted to them under this act, and on or before the 10th day of August in each year he shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury those States which have accepted the provisions of the act and complied therewith, specifying the amounts of money which each State is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act. Upon such certification the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the States entitled thereto the moneys available under this act, payments to be made quarterly on the 15th day of August, November, February, and May of each year.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold the allotment of moneys to any State whenever it shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior that moneys previously allotted have not been expended for the purposes and under the conditions of this act, or that other terms and conditions of this act have not been complied with.

SEC. 9. That if any portion of the moneys received by any State under the provisions of this act shall be diminished, lost, or expended for purposes other than those authorized and contemplated herein, such moneys shall be replaced by the State and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation for such educational work shall be made to that State. That whenever any portion of the fund allotted to any State has not been expended within the year for the purpose provided in this act, a sum equal to the unexpended portion shall be withheld by the Secretary of the Treasury from the next succeeding annual allotment under this act to such State.

SEC. 10. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $250,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and annually thereafter until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, the sum of $1,000,000 for the purpose of administering, carrying out, and enforcing the provisions of this act for cooperative work hereunder, for investigations, studies, and reports through the Bureau of Education, for salaries of officers and assistants, other office and incidental expenses, including the cost of printing, personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, necessary traveling expenses of employees, stationery, office furniture and equipment, and any other expenses necessary in the administration of this act.

SEC. 11. That except as provided in section 10 hereof no moneys appropriated under this act shall be applied directly or indirectly to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of lands, or for the support of any religious or privately owned and conducted school or institution.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make an annual report to Congress on or before December 1 of each year of all operations, expenditures, and allotments under the provisions of this act, including statement as to what has been done by the several States thereunder.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and make all rules and regulations which he shall deem necessary and proper to carry this act into full force and effect.

COTTON FUTURES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I introduce a bill to amend paragraph 5 of section 5 of the so-called cotton-futures act, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (S. 5465) to amend paragraph 5 of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act, approved August 11, 1916, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fifth paragraph of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act, approved August 11, 1916, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all of paragraph 5 after the word "cotton," on line 1, and inserting the following: "to be delivered on, under, or in settlement of such contracts shall be middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict middling, and good middling, the grades mentioned being of the official cotton standards of the United States of white cotton, and the average deliveries shall not grade below middling," so that the paragraph as amended will read as follows:

"Fifth. Provided that cotton to be delivered on, under, or in settlement of such contract shall be middling, strict low middling, low middling, strict middling, and good middling, the grades mentioned being of the official cotton standards of the United States of white cotton, and the average deliveries shall not grade below middling."

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13706) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KIRBY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $106,000 for investigation of rural education, industrial education, physical education, and school hygiene, including personal service in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted an amendment providing that where the constitution of any State prohibits the same from engaging upon internal improvements, or from contracting public debts for extraordinary purposes in an amount sufficient to meet the monetary requirements of the act of July 11, 1916, etc., the sum to which such State is entitled shall be withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury from the principal fund, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. WARREN it was Ordered, That the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. KELLOGG, be relieved from further service as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and that the Senator from Missouri, Mr. SPENCER, be assigned as a member thereof; and

That the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WARREN, be relieved from further service as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and that the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. MOSES, be assigned as a member thereof.

THE CENSUS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit a conference report on the census bill, which I ask may, with the accompanying statement, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an unusual procedure in the Senate to print statements filed by conferees.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I withdraw the statement and ask that the report lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 24, 27, and 28.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, forestry and forest products, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall included each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. A census of Guam and Samoa shall be taken in the same year by the respective governors of said islands and a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the Governor of the Canal Zone in accordance with plans prescribed or approved by the Director of the Census."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "$5,000; the chief clerk and three chief statisticians for the divisions of population, manufactures, and agriculture, respectively, $4,000 each; three"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out insert the following: "for the divisions of vital statistics and statistics of cities, and the chief statistician provided for in section 3 of this act, $3,600 each"; also, on page 4, line 9, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "$3,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That whenever possible women and honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines shall be employed in the positions herein provided for, if in the judgment of the Director of the Census they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such positions."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate, insert the following: "subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, these"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "applicants claim to have"; also on page 6, line 16, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "or" where it occurs the first time and insert the word "of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"And provided further, That in the selection of the additional clerks and employees provided for by section 6 the Director of the Census is authorized to use, so far as practicable, the reemployment registers established by Executive order of November 29, 1918, so far as the same applies to permanent appointments by competition."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, place of abode, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries, nationality or mother tongue of parents of foreign birth, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, tenure of home and the encumbrance thereon, and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person.

"The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, value of farm implements, number of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the quantities of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. Inquiries shall be made as to the quantity of land reclaimed by irrigation and drainage and the crops produced; also as to the location and character of irrigation and drainage enterprises, and the capital invested in such enterprises.

"The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

"The census of manufactures, of forestry and forest products, and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31, next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

"Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

"The number, form, and subdivision of inquiries provided for in section 8 shall be determined by the Director of the Census."

And the Senate agree to the same.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary. It needs prompt action if it is to be acted upon at all. There has been no change made in what the Senate did, and I am sure it will take but a minute to secure action on the report. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and from the amendment amending the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following and transpose the same so that it will precede the word "as," in line 7, on page 1 of the bill: " : Provided, however, That Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor, now or formerly subjects of Turkey, may be included within the populations to receive relief under this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

LEE S. OVERMAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am not going to make opposition to the adoption of the conference report at this time, because I realize how futile it would be. The Senate has recently passed upon the measure by an overwhelming majority, and, inasmuch as the conference report does not change the attitude of the Senate taken a few days ago, I shall simply be content, so far as I am concerned, with voting against the adoption of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

SALARIES OF JUDGES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present a conference report on House bill 12001, but I shall not ask action on it now.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the bill on which the Senator from Georgia presents a conference report?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the bill in reference to judicial salaries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of district courts of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law.

"The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the circuit court of appeals of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals shall receive salaries equal in amount to the salaries provided by this act to be paid judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, payable monthly from the Treasury."

And the Senate agree to the same.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13026. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate so that it may have its proper place.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES (S. DOC. NO. 361).

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the remarks which I ask the privilege of making this morning will not be in the form of a narrative of a journey. Such an attempt on my part would be undesirable, and, indeed, impossible. They will be rather in the form of a statement of the occurrences of first-class importance happening in France and of conditions existing there during the war and immediately following the armistice. My attempt to describe these conditions and occurrences is based in part upon some very well-known facts, known to all Senators, and also upon inquiry from and conversations with a large number of officers and enlisted men as well as civilians in that country.

It should be remembered, Mr. President, that this topic is so vast, the occurrences upon the other side of the ocean were of such tremendous scope, that no man upon earth can know all there is to be known about the war, or, indeed, even the last six months of the war.

I am fully aware, sir, that whatever knowledge I may have acquired by conversation and personal observation of events and conditions may be described as that little knowledge the possession of which is so often "a dangerous thing." I am fully conscious that my conclusions are not infallible, but I nevertheless beg to present some of them to the Senate in the hope that they may contribute some little bit to a better understanding of what has occurred.

November 11, 1918, will go down in history as one of the most significant dates of all times. It marks the final and abject surrender of the greatest military power the world has ever known. Had any person prophesied in April or May, 1918, that such a result would be brought about before the conclusion of the calendar year he would have been scoffed at as the wildest of dreamers. Indeed, such a prophecy would have received no support from any of the military authorities of the allied nations. And yet the great result loomed into view, as it were, in a moment of time, in the twinkling of an eye, and before the world could realize the blessing that was coming to it it had arrived. Investigators, experts, savants had been telling us for at least two years that if Germany were to be conquered it would be through an industrial collapse within the German Empire. Most Americans and most of our allies believed this to be true and had grave doubts of being able to overcome the German Army in the field. Indeed, during all those glorious weeks, commencing in the midsummer of 1918 and running into the autumn, the prevailing public opinion was that the German Army, although it was being driven back, would undoubtedly intrench itself along the Rhine and defy for many months to come the allied offensive; and, furthermore, that that army would keep the field and maintain its defense until the industrial structure behind it, and upon which it was depending, collapsed. Those of us who entertained such a belief were mistaken. The victory was primarily a military victory, achieved upon the field of battle. Although it is true that the German industrial organization was weakened and was constantly losing strength, it was able, until the very end, to maintain the army in the field with supplies and munitions proportionate to the strength of that army. It was the army itself that was beaten, and its high command admitted the situation when it accepted the terms of the armistice submitted to it by Marshal Foch and his colleagues. A cursory examination of the terms furnishes the proof of this assertion.

The year 1917 witnessed some exceedingly important events. First was the revolution in Russia, resulting in the deposing of the Czar, the establishment of the so-called Kerensky government, and the beginning of the poisoning of the Russian Army and the Russian people with the virus of Bolshevism, which finally brought about the utter collapse and withdrawal from the conflict of that great power. The month of March in that year, 1917, marked in effect the withdrawal of Russia as an aggressive factor in the war. The other event of surpassing importance was the entry of the United States into the war on April 6, 1917. Our entrance had no immediate effect on the battle fields; we were unprepared and compelled to start in, practically de novo, to build up a great military organization—an undertaking which consumed many months and many millions of money. Italy stood fast on the Piave. The British and French, scarcely realizing the extent of the Russian disintegration then in progress, started an offensive in the spring. The French achieved but mediocre results, at great cost, followed by much discouragement. The British in Flanders were more successful, particularly at Vimy Ridge and Messines Ridge, and continued their offensive practically throughout the rest of the season. Their gains, while a little more successful in the neighborhood of Ypres and Paschendaele Ridge, were not decisive and were made at a staggering cost in casualties. The year 1917 closed with very little to the credit side of the allies. The end of the war was still far away. By the middle of the winter 1917–18 the Russian collapse became complete. That great Empire was destroyed by internal dissensions, its armies disbanded, a disgraceful peace with Germany signed soon thereafter, and the forces of civilization definitely and finally lost the services of 6,000,000 soldiers. This Russian collapse changed completely the whole picture. The German armies upon the Russian front were moved during the winter of 1918 to the west, to confront the British and the French. The weight of man power as between the two forces was definitely shifted to the German side. Commencing in early spring of 1918 there ensued a race between the Germans, on the one hand, attempting to crush the British and French armies, and the Americans, on the other, hastening to the succor of their gallant and hard-pressed allies. Can we ever forget the dark days following the great German offensive against the Fifth British Army in Picardy on March 21, 1918? It was launched in the direction of Amiens and was intended to split apart the British Army on the north and the French Army on the south. It came within an ace of succeeding. The Germans were finally held 9 miles from the city of Amiens, and even at that distance the main-line railway connecting the British area with the French area was under the fire of the German long-range guns. Can we ever forget the German offensive against the British in Flanders that followed on April 8, which recaptured most of the ground gained by the British in the neighborhood of Ypres in 1917, including Kemmel Hill, and which was aimed to drive the British Army back upon the channel ports? It was at this moment that Marshal Haig, like a true Briton, spoke the truth and told his soldiers they were fighting "with their backs to the wall." The German attack was brought to a standstill in the nick of time. Can we ever forget the iron that entered into our souls on May 27, when the Germans smashed through the French line at the Chemin des Dames and reached the Marne at Chateau-Thierry on June 1, covering, Mr. President, nearly 30 miles in four days? Indeed, Mr. President, those three great offensives seemed to indicate that the German military machine was invincible. The British and the French had in each case managed to stop them, but only after a terrific struggle and with great losses.

No man can tell what might have occurred had our allies been left unsuccored. It may be that eventually they would have held their own. It is certain, however, that they would have been subjected to enormous strategic handicaps, that the war would have been prolonged indefinitely, and that the Germans would have made further inroads upon the garden soil of France. Could we get there in time to turn the tables? That was the one and only question in the hearts and minds of the allied peoples.

Let us consider for a moment how we got there and how long it took us to get there. We went into the war on April 6, 1917, as I have said, unprepared. We sent our First Division to France in June of that year, quite untrained and only partly equipped. It was followed by the Twenty-sixth Division, then by the Forty-second, and then by the Second Division. Through the autumn of 1917 and the winter of 1918 more divisions followed and an appropriate number of units to serve in the system of supply. During the winter of 1918 the First, Second, Twenty-sixth, and Forty-second Divisions, still in training areas and trenches in comparatively quiet sectors, attained a reasonable degree of efficiency, particularly the First Division, which landed first upon the shores of France Other divisions, including the Thirty-second and the Third, following them, were in the training process and on the road toward efficiency. It takes a long time, Mr. President, to fit troops and the supply system back of them for participation in modern warfare.

I desire to place emphasis upon an important date in the year 1918, namely, May 28. Let it be remembered that prior to that date the German offensives of March 21 and April 8 had occurred; furthermore, that another, the third German offensive, had been launched with signal success on May 27, the day before. Let it be remembered—indeed, let it never be forgotten—that America on May 28 had been in the war, a belligerent, since April 6 of the year before, a period of 13 months and 3 weeks. Let it be remembered and understood that by that date, May 28, after 13 months and 3 weeks of American participation in the war, no American troops had taken part in any major engagement. Let it be understood that the great French and British public, comparatively uninformed as to the difficulties of arming a hitherto unarmed nation and transporting its armies thousands of miles, were commencing to despair of American assistance and wondering if Americans would ever get into the fight.

In painting this picture I am trying to portray the suspense, the doubt, and, indeed, the cost resulting from our unpreparedness. I attach no blame whatsoever to the leaders of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. They did their best, and they did it well, with the puny weapons placed at their disposal at the outset by this great Republic. On May 28 the First American Division launched an attack on a division front against the German lines at Cantigny, the first action of importance participated in by American troops. It was successful, eminently so. It came, as I have indicated before, the day following the launching of the third great German offensive. It was not important as a part of the strategy of the war, but it was of great importance in that it showed the hard-pressed British and French that American troops had at last arrived in the theater of active operations and that the American soldiers could fight as well as the best of them. And even the fame of this comparatively small operation was submerged somewhat by the tremendous events that were transpiring. A week later, however, another and more dramatic event cheered the souls of the British and French, when, on June 4, the American Second Division, including a brigade of marines acting as infantry, performed a vital service in repulsing the Germans at Chateau-Thierry in their drive toward Paris. The moral effect of these two actions, culminating in the dramatic repulse of the Germans at Chateau-Thierry, can not be overestimated. Its effect upon the British and French armies and peoples was enormous—America had arrived at last! Her men could fight, and did fight, with dash and punch. They were a revelation to the war-worn veterans who for four years had withstood the German onslaught. The services which these two divisions performed were proportionally much greater than their numerical strength and their actual fighting weight. Their arrival and their conduct upon the field of battle was a guaranty to our allies that the American troops that were even then pouring into France would eventually turn the scale.

Senators can well understand the feeling of a German soldier and the feeling, we will say, of a French or British soldier in a situation of this sort. The German soldier, as I shall indicate later on, never lost his morale during this war; he fought savagely until the end; but he all the time knew when he was fighting that the reinforcements which he could expect to reach him coming from the rear were dwindling day by day, and that the day would come when he could get no more help. The French soldier and the British soldier, on the other hand, fighting with equal bravery and with astounding tenacity, knew after June 4 that, no matter how long they fought, how much they suffered, reinforcements were coming to them from behind.

On July 15, east of Rheims, the Germans launched their last and one of their greatest offensives; and it was an offensive, Senators, that has never received the public notice to which it is entitled. Over a 25-mile front they attacked the French Army under Gen. Gouraud and against what was perhaps the most skillfully contrived defense of the whole war. I may say, in passing, that Gen Gouraud ascertained but a few days before that attack was launched the exact minute that the Germans were going to attack, and he made his dispositions in such a manner that they resulted in the annihilation, almost, of an entire German army. He was assisted in the defense by a part of the Forty-second American Division, which occupied a small portion of the 25-mile front. The Germans suffered a complete and fearfully bloody repulse. On the Marne on the same day they took and for a few hours held some ground against the French and the American Third Division. The Third Division promptly counterattacked and drove the Germans back to the river, capturing a large number of them, and definitely crushed the attack. On July 18, three days after the repulse of the last German advance, with an ever-increasing number of American divisions, aggregating, as I remember, nine combat divisions, Marshal Foch launched his French armies and his American divisions against the sides of the famous Marne salient. The salient was crushed in, and from that time until November 11 not a day went by without witnessing a retreat by the German armies upon some portion of the far-flung line.

As the midsummer and autumn seasons progressed, hundreds of thousands of German soldiers were killed, wounded, captured, or exhausted. The organization of that army remained intact and its morale showed only slight signs of impairment; but its numbers were dwindling, likewise its capacity to endure. Driven, finally, to the point where its lateral lines of communication were cut, at Sedan on November 6 and Meziers about the same date, its north and south wings separated, in a military sense, with its back against the forest of the Ardennes, through which it would have been impossible to escape the onslaughts of the allies, realizing that more and even heavier blows were to be rained upon it, and which, had they been delivered, would have brought about a great military debacle, the German military machine laid down its arms. It preferred to quit rather than sustain the overwhelming defeat. The German can be likened to the prize fighter who, seeing the knockout blow coming from his more powerful and more skillful opponent—and I use the term "skillful" advisedly—lies down and takes the count. When this happened on November 11 of all the great German Army there were but two divisions in reserve rested up and fit to go into the line afresh. Marshal Foch possessed a large and ever-increasing reserve—American, French, and British, principally American. And I venture the opinion that had the war lasted two weeks longer we would have witnessed the launching of a terrific and overwhelming attack against another point in the German line which would have rolled up and captured great masses of their troops. Mr. President, I am as confident of that statement as I am that I am standing on this floor. The Germans undoubtedly knew this. They may or may not have known, too, that the British air squadrons were prepared to bomb Berlin within a week following November 11. Indeed, the Hun was beaten on the field of battle.

Let us now consider the part which the American Expeditionary Forces played in this great drama.

First of all there is the enlisted man, popularly known as the doughboy. One sees him everywhere in France. It was my privilege to see him, too, for only a few hours, it is true, in the occupied region of Germany. You will find him on nearly every road and lane, trudging along with his unit, driving a motor truck, running a motorcycle, and, when off duty, strolling about. You will find him living in the cellars of wrecked houses in that ghastly, devastated region, in captured German dugouts, in shacks and huts contrived for his shelter, and in comfortable billets in the billeting areas. He is unloading freight on the docks, handling electric cranes, switching railway cars, running locomotives, setting signals, tossing red-hot rivets in machine shops, running laundries, telephones, telegraphs, regulating traffic in crowded cities, digging, building bridges, railroads, and highways, guarding German prisoners—a rather satisfactory sight—gathering and piling up abandoned German shells and hand grenades—a rather ticklish job—and engaging in a thousand and one other occupations. I can not think of anything that the doughboy does not do. I am inclined to believe that there is one occupation he delights in above all others when he is off duty, and that is playing with little children. One can readily imagine how he has crept into the hearts of the civilian population of France through his gentle affection for the children of France—those little children who have suffered so much during this war.

Our soldier, Mr. President, is a home boy. He is very far from his own home. He is hungry for the atmosphere of home, and, that being so, he gets much happiness and consolation from chatting with the children in the French homes. To his officers he is a never-ending source of wonder. He astonished them by the avidity with which he sought to learn the business of war, by the ardor with which he went at his training, sometimes under wretchedly unfavorable circumstances. In chilly rain, drizzle, and mud—and outdoor France in wintertime is all mud—his desire to learn never slackened. Apparently his officers could not give him too much to do. He had come to France to lick the Germans. He suspected there were some people who doubted his ability to do so. He was determined to show them that he could—and he did. His officers were confident from the beginning of his courage, his intelligence, and his initiative. But he surprised them with the dashing quality of his courage, with his terrific punch. Well trained, half trained, or trained not at all, he showed that same supreme courage; and he surprised his officers most of all by his patience, a quality that is sorely tried under the miserable conditions that must attend war, but which our men managed to maintain through it all; and as a nation, Senators, Americans have not had a reputation for being patient. The American soldiers showed that quality to a superlative degree, and, most of all, sir, in the hospitals where the wounded lay—patience and cheerfulness; not a murmur, not a complaint; no sign of discouragement; nothing but cheerfulness. The regard in which he is held by his own leaders is reflected in the observations which on many occasions I heard falling from the lips of officers: "Don't give us the credit; don't compliment us. It is the enlisted man that did this job. He is the man, and he is a great man."

But the soldier, Mr. President, no matter how brave he is, no matter how strong he is, can not fight unless he is fed, armed, and transported. A great organization must be built up behind the soldier in the front line. And if that organization is not efficient, if it can not cause the soldiers, the rations, the equipment, and the ammunition to arrive at the right place at the required time the soldiers themselves are hopelessly handicapped. Not only are they handicapped but their very lives are in danger—the cause itself may be lost. In speaking of the organization back of the lines, I mean what is generally known as the staff. Good staff work brings victory and saves lives; bad staff work means defeat and death.

Mr. President, we have never had here in the United States a well organized and efficient Army staff. It has never existed here, save with the possible exception of the closing year of the Civil War under Gen. Grant, in the War Department nor elsewhere in the country. The public and the Congress have taken little interest in this subject. Many people have been inclined to the belief that staff work was a "soft job," sought after by officers who preferred to avoid the hardships of the front line. It is extremely unfortunate that this indifference and misunderstanding has existed. Indeed, in the days of peace, before we went into the war, a considerable body of Regular Army officers fought against the establishment of a genuine General Staff system for our Army. We went into the war without a staff system worthy of the name in its modern meaning. Bureaus and divisions were working at cross-purposes—there was no centralized control, no body of officers instructed and trained to put into force the policy of the Commander in Chief. Those of us who followed the inquiries of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs last winter remember well the chaotic condition which at times existed in the War Department, due not so much to the fault of individuals as to an utter lack of system, such a lack of system as we witnessed here in 1917, and which, if duplicated in France, would have made it utterly impossible for the American Expeditionary Force to have accomplished one-tenth of its task. Gen. Pershing realized from the beginning, as he indicates in his report to the Secretary of War under date of November 20, 1918, that he must build up a genuine staff in France. He and his officers learned from the experience of the British and French in this regard. At the beginning of the great European war the British had but an indifferent staff organization. They learned from bitter experience the necessity of modernizing it. At the beginning of the war the French found themselves in possession of an excellently trained and highly competent general staff, and the possession of it saved the French Armies, and, upon one or two occasions, helped mightily to save the armies of her allies.

Let me cite an instance that will illustrate what I mean. It will be remembered that in the autumn of 1916 the Germans and Austrians struck a fearful blow at the Italians on the Isonzo River; that the Italians, taken by surprise, were outflanked, driven back, and lost very heavily in men and guns. It became apparent immediately that men and guns must be sent to Italy. Thereupon this incident took place—I have it from an officer well acquainted with the French staff work:

On a certain midnight—I do not know the date—immediately following the decision of the French high command to send an army to Italy a French general officer received a telephone order to the effect that he was to command the army to be formed and sent to Italy. That general officer spent the rest of the night and early morning hours in telephoning and summoning to his assistance the officers who were to compose his staff. By noon of the same day the first French division entrained for Italy. And then followed rapidly the entraining of division after division through the succeeding days. And when I say "division," I mean a complete division, equipped and supplied for fighting—infantry, artillery, machine gunners, motor transport, animal-drawn transport, including the horses and mules, rations, ambulances, medical supplies, field hospitals; in fact, everything needed for the business at hand. I am told, and I believe it to be true, that the van of this French army detrained back of the Italian lines and marched up to the rear of the Italian positions on the evening of the second day after their departure from France; furthermore, that the movement was completed in two weeks, and included the sending of half a dozen British divisions in addition to nine French divisions that were sent; that it took 30,000 railway cars to move those armies; and that the whole movement was conducted with the utmost smoothness and dispatch upon an instant's notice. The French staff system responded to the sudden emergency without the slipping of a cog. Indeed, it is highly probable that their staff officers months before had laid out the plans for just such a movement should it be required. It may be that that very efficiency in the French general staff saved Italy and saved the allied cause. The incident illustrates what I mean by staff work.

And so Gen. Pershing and his lieutenants started in June, 1917, to build up a staff system competent to assure the proper handling and management of the Expeditionary Force. The system was modeled largely upon the French system, with some valuable contributions from the British. It had to be planned and laid out on a scale sufficiently large to meet the needs of the American Army no matter how large that Army might become during the progress of the war. That is where we Americans had a tremendous advantage. We could lay out our installations and plan them upon a tremendous scale, because we could profit by the experience of the British, who had to build their installations piecemeal and had to scatter them in several small units. They were overtaken by an emergency about once a month, or once in two months, and had to meet it instantly, without much planning ahead. We had the advantage in that respect, for while the British and the French soldiers were holding off the Germans and our Army here in the United States was being trained our staff officers in France could lay out these enormous installations on a tremendous scale, allowing for indefinite expansion. Docks, storage depots, railway yards, intermediate depots and rail heads, hospitals, convalescent hospitals, replacement camps, repair shops for ordnance and motor trucks and every other mechanical device used by an army, freight-car assembling plants, locomotive-erecting shops, and railway repair shops. Rivers and harbors had to be dredged, additional double tracking of railroads had to be provided. In short, a great supply system had to be thought out sufficient to meet the needs of 2,000,000, 3,0000,000, 4,000,000 men—men, mind you, who were to be employed in a vocation in which conservation of material is seldom practiced—employed, rather, at a business which involves ruthless consumption and destruction of material. The task required vision, conviction, and daring. To accomplish it required many, many months of unremitting effort, ofttimes with discouragement and disappointment attending those efforts. The supplies shipped from America being insufficient, in spite of their ever-increasing volume, the American Expeditionary Forces were compelled to purchase, according to a plan agreed upon with the French and British purchasing authorities, actually more tons of material than were shipped from the United States up to the time of the signing of the armistice.

This gives some idea of the size of this undertaking. We are proud, of course, of the amount of cargo that we shipped from America. We purchased more than that amount in France and in neighboring neutral countries. Much of this work had to be well under way before a single American fighting man could be put in the front line. As it grew, as it approached completion, as it acquired efficiency, more and more combat troops were sent to the front, and as the number of troops increased and the system of supply, known in the Army as the S. O. S., expanded, the staff to handle the whole gigantic effort was slowly and painfully gathered together and trained. We had never planned for such an undertaking. None of our officers had ever handled large bodies of troops, and the centralized control had to be created, inspired, and educated.

The Army was short of several items of material and equipment. Some of the shortages were unavoidable; some, I believe, can be traced to the makeshift system, or lack of system, here at home. It is a matter of common knowledge—and the fact has been stated by Gen. Pershing—that the American Expeditionary Force had to rely almost entirely upon the French for its field artillery and, up to the last few moments of the war, for the shells to feed the guns. The same is true of aeroplanes. I need not go into a detailed discussion of that subject. It has been thrashed out here upon many occasions in the past. As an instance of our shortage in planes, however, I may state the fact that on the occasion of the American attack against the St. Mihiel salient, on September 12, of the 14 pursuit squadrons operating with our forces only 3 were all American; the rest were French. We borrowed hundreds of motor trucks from the French and British because we did not have enough of our own. On several occasions American combat divisions were transported from one point in the line to another in French motor-truck trains. No American-built tanks reached the battle front. The French supplied us with what tanks they could spare. Most of them were manned by our own personnel. With the exception of the machine guns in two or three divisions at the very end of the war, all the machine guns, light and heavy, were obtained from the French. I may say in passing that two or three divisions did secure an issue of the famous light Browning gun and that it gave excellent satisfaction. That was in the last 10 days or two weeks of the war.

One can not exaggerate the embarrassments and difficulties to which these shortages gave rise. Nor do I believe that it can be contended that the supplying of all this equipment did not strain the resources of our allies. And yet they supplied these things with a cheerfulness and alacrity which should and does elicit our highest praise and deepest gratitude. They knew, of course, that this equipment would be used in the common cause. They put aside all selfish considerations and gave us all they could spare, and perhaps a little more.

One shortage was, from time to time, very serious, and that was the shortage in forage and horses, particularly for the Artillery. Through some miscalculation, derangement, or change in plans the supply of forage for animals actually approached the vanishing point during last winter. Artillery horses had to be put on short rations. Short rations are not conducive to the staying powers or the long life of a horse. To meet the shortage in animals, which was so severe upon occasion that many batteries of Artillery were rendered almost incapable of moving, thousands of horses were purchased in France and 13,000 were supplied to us by the British during the last weeks of the contest in preparation for the Argonne offensive. It is quite possible, I realize, that this shortage in horses and forage was unavoidable. I do not know its cause. It may be that the scarcity of trans-Atlantic tonnage accounts for it. I venture this criticism, that the American Army, generally speaking, does not know how to take care of horses. The officers in charge of artillery and transport units did not receive sufficient instruction to enable them in turn to teach their men how to care for a horse. We teach our people at West Point and at our mounted service schools how to ride, but we do not teach them enough about the feeding, the grooming, the shoeing, and what might be called the coddling of a horse. The Artillery and transport horse in war time is put under a terrific strain; the irregular hours of work and feeding tend to upset him. He must be nursed and petted and coddled constantly or he will start to go downhill in condition. Once started downhill he fades rapidly, and it is exceedingly difficult to save him.

One has only to see the British horses in France to understand what can be accomplished. In traveling about one encounters upon the road from time to time long columns of British transport. The horses are fat, sleek, and with shining coats; they are well fed and well groomed. Proper grooming is a great restorative to a hard-worked horse. The leather of the British harness and saddles is well oiled and cleaned. It fits the horse. The vehicles themselves are in first-class condition, well painted, and with shining brass hub caps. The British transport never fails to get there with rations, ammunition, and shells. I gathered that our officers in France are properly envious of the British in this respect. I hope the lesson will never be forgotten and that the American Army horse of the future will be properly cared for.

But in spite of the shortages, Mr. President, to which I referred a few moments ago, the American Expeditionary Forces managed to go ahead with ever-increasing strength. A general staff system was slowly built up and reached a stage of development at which it was functioning with power and ever-increasing efficiency. Had the war continued another six months America would have displayed her real power. The S. O. S. would have reached approximate completion. The fact is that on November 11 we had just commenced to fight. I suspect the Germans knew this. We can be sure that they knew of the valor of our fighting men. They had good reason to know of it. It is quite probable that they knew something of the great docks at Bordeaux newly built, a mile long; of the storage depot near that port a mile wide and three miles long; of the freight-car assembling plant near La Rochelle, where a hundred freight cars were being turned out every day; of the locomotive erecting shops in the same neighborhood which turned out six locomotives every day; of the great pier at Montoir, up the river Loire from St. Nazaire—a pier 5,000 feet long, with berths for 12 ships, almost completed. The storage depot at Montoir as large as that at Bordeaux, completed and in full operation; the great intermediate depot at Gievres, 7 miles by 2 miles in extent, and the forestry companies which cut and sawed nearly 60,000,000 feet of lumber in the French forests. All these and a dozen more gigantic undertakings, just approaching completion, just reaching their full stride, were probably sensed by the Germans. One can easily understand their state of mind when they realized they were confronted with such a power.

Mr. President, I am glad that Gen. Pershing and his people had a free hand in France. I am glad that they were many, many miles away from Washington and comparatively free from its prejudices, jealousies, and out-of-date military traditions. They had their troubles; they made mistakes; their machinery was new and untried; they encountered handicaps of various kinds; but they were eager to profit by the experience of our allies, and they builded upon a broad foundation. But for the inevitable loss of life which would have ensued, I could wish that the staff and supply systems and our combat divisions, which upon November 11 were just commencing to reach their stride, had been permitted to operate against the Germans for another six months. And, Mr. President, I do not believe the Congress can legislate to the best advantage for the establishment of a permanent military policy for the United States, including the vital question of a general staff, until Gen. Pershing's people come home and tell us something of their experience. A general staff can not be created overnight. It takes months, yes, years, to create such an organization and to permeate the whole Army with its spirit and its purpose. I hope that every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House of Representatives will read Gen. Pershing's report, and when those men come home I hope that every Member will seek information from them, will learn of their successes and their failures, and that Congress and the public. and, indeed, the Army itself, having learned the lesson, will never forget it.

Mr. President, the development of the American Expeditionary Forces reached such a stage in the middle of the summer after the action at Chateau-Thierry, after the actions in the Marne salient and on the Vesle River, as to warrant Gen. Pershing in organizing the first American Field Army. He did that through the month of August, summoning to the sector in the neighborhood of St. Mihiel, the sector commonly known as the sector north of Toul, divisions which had been operating with French divisions or which up to that time had been in quiet trench training or in areas of training in the rear.

Most of the month of August was consumed in the organization of the first American Army. It attacked the St. Mihiel salient on September 12. The success of that attack is familiar to every Senator. Suffice it to say that it was completely successful. All the combat troops on the front line attack were American, with the exception of a few French troops at the point of the salient near the town of St. Mihiel itself. The French contributed for that attack a considerable body of artillery with its personnel to supplement our artillery. We never had enough artillery all our own, but the French always managed to give us what we lacked, guns to be manned either by our men or by their own men.

The aerial mobilization accompanying the St. Mihiel salient was the largest in the history of the war. Something like 1,400 airplanes were mobilized for that offensive under the command, as I understand it, of an American aviation officer. A comparatively small proportion of those planes were American, of course. The British loaned several squadrons and the French many squadrons, as I have indicated, in the case of the pursuit squadrons.

The losses in that attack were, on the American side, comparatively small, something like 2,000 men. The plans worked perfectly; everything moved on time—indeed, a little ahead of time—and resulted in the capture of the entire salient in about one day and a half, or two days, and the capture of something like 15,000 German troops as well as a large amount of material.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator means that the total loss on the American side was about 2,000 men? He does not mean that with reference to the air squadron?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the total loss?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The total casualties on the American side. I have no idea what the casualties in the air squadrons were.

I need not enlarge upon any description of that engagement. It was not as bitterly or as savagely fought by the Germans as the succeeding engagements or some of the preceding engagements. In fact, it seems to be generally understood that they were about to retire from that salient and were taken by surprise by the suddenness and power of our attack.

When that particular task was finished the Army took over, with increased numbers and with the organization of a second American field army, a front extending from the Meuse River, near the city of Verdun, westward to and through the forest of Argonne. On September 26 the great offensive up through the Argonne forest commenced. The first attack launched against the carefully prepared German position was eminently successful. The American troops forced their way through it, with the help of a tremendous artillery barrage in which the French artillery assisted the American artillery, but after crossing and overcoming the first prepared German line the American Army found itself face to face with the most difficult country in France. I had never supposed that such a wilderness existed in France. It is a series of jumbled hills of varying degrees of steepness and height, covered in large part by tangled undergrowth, which gives perfect opportunity for a defending force to secrete itself.

The German positions were not elaborately prepared systems of trenches as they were in the first line that was overrun. They were rather a series of defensive positions filled with machine-gun nests hidden under the bushes and tangled underbrush on the hills and on the hillsides and in little cuplike valleys. Artillery observation and aerial observation was exceedingly difficult, and the only way in which the American Army could force its way through that country was by constant pressure day and night, by a succession of small attacks and big attacks, endeavoring to filter in amongst the machine guns and surround them and overpower them.

It was an exceedingly difficult task, and made more so because there were only two roads leading into that region of a character to permit the transportation of any large amount of supplies. It was difficult upon occasion to reach the men in the front line with supplies. Owing to that lack of roads and the character of the country, it took five weeks to overcome some of those series of machine-gun nests and it cost many casualties—inevitably so.

But, Mr. President, it must never be forgotten that the Argonne offensive was part of a general scheme which was at the same time taking effect from Belgium to Lorraine, that the attack of the American Army up through the Argonne and up the country on the west side of the Meuse River was timed to have its best effect, taken together with the British attack in Picardy, which was going on at the same time, and the French pressure on the west of the Argonne forest on the American left flank.

Attacks were pushed by the British, mind you, from August 8, at which date Marshal Haig started his great offensive against the Germans. The British continued their attacks until November 11 without a day's cessation, and their casualties averaged 30,000 per week.

I venture the opinion that these attacks were pressed by the British, the French, and the Americans through the months of September and October as the result of a conviction which came to the high command that Germany could be whipped within the year, a result which was not suspected in July; and when it did appear possible, and indeed highly probable, that the German Army could be driven back before the winter set in and its lines of communication cut, then indeed the savage attacks were kept up day after day without any cessation whatever. They were costly in casualties, Mr. President, but they ended the war and thereby saved, no man can tell, how many thousands of lives that would otherwise have been poured out this winter and next spring and summer.

Before discussing any other American activities it ought to be stated that the Argonne offensive, conducted by the Americans and assisted on their left by the French, although it is fair to say the Americans had by far the more difficult country to traverse, reached its culmination on November 6 when, with one last dash, the railway line which joined the German armies on the south in the neighborhood of Metz and the German armies on the north in Belgium and Flanders was cut at Sedan and at Mezières. When that line was cut the doom of the German Army was at hand.

American troops were active upon other sectors, and I beg leave to describe one of those operations, for, to be frank, I made a special examination of it.

In May and June of 1918 we sent 10 divisions of American troops to France to be trained back of the British lines in northern France and to be used if need be in reinforcing the British Army. But in August, when Gen. Pershing commenced to organize the first American field army for the St. Mihiel offensive, 8 of those 10 divisions were taken away from the British areas and sent down to the St. Mihiel area to form a part of the first American Army. The two American divisions that were left with the British served with the British during their entire service in France. They were the Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth Divisions, the first made up of the New York National Guard Division and the second the National Guard Division from Tennessee and North Carolina and South Carolina.

These men used the British rifle. They stored their own rifles and took the British rifle in order to simplify the problem of small-arms ammunition supply. It may be of interest to know that these men say that the British service rifle was entirely satisfactory. They lived entirely on British rations. Their wounded and sick were taken care of in British ambulances, British field hospitals, and British base hospitals, and their wounded were evacuated to England. In fact, those two divisions, in a sense, were an integral part of the British Army. They did not even have their own supply trains with them. Their artillery, too, had been sent to the St. Mihiel sector to operate with the American First Army and later with the American Second Army in Argonne.

Those two divisions consisted only of infantry, the machine gunners, the engineers, and the Signal Corps battalions, all, practically, foot soldiers. Everything was supplied by the British. They served for many weeks in Belgium in the trenches. It was they, Mr. President, who reoccupied Kemmel Hill. But in the middle of September they were moved down farther to the south. On September 29 they were thrown against the Hindenburg line.

I have attempted to describe something of the Argonne country; perhaps Senators will bear with me if I attempt to describe, inadequately, I fear, something of the nature of the defense which these two divisions found confronting them and which they attacked and captured. The Canal du Nord, which, if I remember correctly, connects the Oise River and the Scheldt, running approximately north and south, passes through the towns of St. Quentin and Cambrai. St. Quentin and Cambrai, Senators will remember, were towns situated upon or close to the famous Hindenburg line. Midway between those two towns the canal itself runs under a hill through a tunnel, which is approximately 3 miles long. The Hindenburg line in that sector was based upon that canal along most of the distance between St. Quentin and Cambrai. Its strongest point was the point where the canal pierced this hill and ran through this long tunnel. The Germans had established two immensely strong lines out in front of the hill pierced by the tunnel, and an immensely strong defensive position along the top of the hill pierced by the canal. From the tunnel itself they had cut long passageways, built in the form of stairways, at least 5 feet wide, at frequent intervals, which enabled their troops, taking refuge in this 3-mile tunnel, on a moment's notice, to climb the stairways and get into the trenches on top of the hill and in front of the hill. It was a vast maze of passageways. The tunnel was lighted with electricity, and the German troops had their kitchens there. Canal barges had been backed into the tunnel by the Germans, the German troops living in bunks built into the barges. Each end of the tunnel was blocked by an enormously thick concrete wall, with slits in it for machine guns.

On September 29 the Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth Divisions of American troops were launched against that position. It required three days for them to overcome it. Their losses were very severe. Frankly, Senators, I do not see how men could have gone through such a position and come out alive. The achievement was astounding. I think it would seem so to any civilian after seeing that maze of trenches and underground passages, acres and acres of barbed wire, and the canal itself. The men were subjected to a fearful enfilading fire from their left flank as they pushed their way into this position. A British division assisted upon the right flank—a famous division, the Forty-sixth Highlanders. They crossed the open canal south of the tunnel. The American objectives were 3 kilometers away from their starting point, but they reached them on the first day.

Then ensued a terrific hand-to-hand contest to hold what they had taken. An Australian division was thrown in to help them, and the Australians and the Americans fought side by side there for two days. One battalion—the One hundred and seventh Infantry, which Senators may be interested in knowing is largely the old Seventh New York—was for two and a half days separated, far out in advance, having reached the objective assigned to them, and was reached by airplanes, which dropped cartridges and chocolate to the men. At the end of two and a half days support reached those men, and the action was complete.

Gen. Haig and Gen. Rawlinson, the British field army commander, showered compliments on those two divisions. They had achieved what I honestly believe to be one of the greatest achievements of this war. It shattered the strongest German defensive position in France, and resulted in the crumbling of that whole portion of the German line.

Whether it be in the Argonne or whether it be in Picardy, where this attack took place, or in Belgium, where we loaned two divisions—the Thirty-seventh and the Ninety-first—to assist the British and the Belgians on the River Scheldt, our men have done their duty, done it splendidly.

This brings me to a brief discussion of the replacement system. Senators will realize that replacements must be brought to the front, and the division units which have suffered casualties and wastage must be kept filled or they will lose their power. This was carried out upon a large scale by the American Expeditionary Force. The replacements did reach the divisions, but in a way that I think is susceptible of comment. When the American soldier was wounded and was sent back from the front line to a hospital in the American area he was treated and given good treatment. When he recovered he was sent to a replacement camp, and when fit for duty it was expected, of course, that he would resume a position in the fighting line. When, however, the man having thus been wounded was sent back to the hospital and eventually found himself in a replacement camp, and then was sent back to the front line, he was not sent back to his original company nor to his original regiment, nor, indeed, to his original division, but in many cases—in fact, in the majority of cases—he was sent to a strange division, a strange regiment, or a strange company. Mr. President, this caused many heartburnings. Nothing can be a more severe blow to a soldier than to separate him from the company with which he has fought, with which he has trained, and with the members of which he is thoroughly acquainted. I hope that when we further systematize and perfect our military system we shall work out a replacement system which shall be automatic as nearly as may be, but which shall, so far as possible, insure that when a man has dropped out of the line to have his injuries treated he shall go back to that same company and serve with the same men with whom he was serving when he was wounded.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. The statement which the Senator from New York has just made is one of great importance, in my opinion, in the organization of an army. I have been somewhat familiar with it, and I have wondered why the present policy has been adopted and followed. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows the theory on which it was done? I suppose there must have been some reason for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can only give the opinion of an amateur. I think we got off on the wrong foot in this replacement effort. It started in this country. I remind the Senator from Massachusetts that, as our divisions were formed in cantonments in this country during the autumn of 1917 and the winter of 1917–18, men were taken out of divisions when they were on the point of reaching a stage where they had esprit and morale, sent off on special duty, and definitely separated from their divisions. The result was that when most of our divisions were ready to sail for France they were far below war strength and were hastily filled up with new men and strange men on the eve of sailing.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am about to complete just one phase of the explanation.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Seventy-seventh Division, before it left Camp Upton for France, received 9,000 new, strange men two weeks before its departure. They came from Camp Devens. The replacement system should have had its basis in this country; the combat divisions that were sent across should have been reinforced by a constant stream of trained replacements from this country; and, so far as possible, a soldier drafted from the State of New York should have been sent to a New York division, and, so far as possible, a soldier drafted from Minnesota should have been sent to a division recruited and organized from Minnesota and adjoining States; for there is nothing more valuable in warfare than that esprit and morale which attends the perpetuation of a military unit and its recruitment from a certain locality, if that can be accomplished.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I entirely agree with the Senator, and I rose simply to state what occurred in one of our very best Minnesota regiments, the First Regiment of the Minnesota National Guard. They had been training for a long time, but the regiment was all broken up by taking out what were called "replacement troops" and sending them to France. In this way the regiment was entirely demoralized and broken up, and the men who were left here and those who were sent abroad to make replacements were demoralized and discouraged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no question, Mr. President, as to the effect of that kind of thing upon the morale of the enlisted man. I have known of men sent back to the front line to join and serve in strange divisions, in strange companies, who deserted those companies and tramped the roads of France to get back to their old company and fight with it. Sometimes I believe that the higher ranking officers of our Military Establishment are inclined to handle soldiers as automatons, and do not understand some of the human equations which enter into a soldier's life. The heartache that that kind of thing causes can not be described adequately.

To our Regular Army prior to this war no such problem presented itself. Our Regular regiments are recruited from all over the country; they have no local attachment; they have no local pride back of them. As they enlist and are assigned to companies, they do not know their neighbors in the ranks, never have heard of them before, and when they leave that company they never hear of them again, and they do not care much. A Regular regiment in our Army does not know what that kind of spirit and morale means. They are merely numbered serially. I have always believed that one of the handicaps that the Regular Army has had to contend with was the fact that no portion of America has the slightest interest in any unit of of the Regular Army. The name "Thirteenth Infantry" or "Fifteenth Cavalry" or "Sixteenth Field Artillery" does not mean anything. It is just a serial number given to a group of men who have been gathered and thrown together and welded into a regiment without any distinguishing character.

Note how the British do it, Mr. President. So far as they could they operated their replacement system so that a soldier who volunteered from the county of Suffolk, in England, joined a Suffolk battalion in France, where he would have some friends. Battalion after battalion was organized in the British Army, as it grew from a small regular establishment up to a great force of 4,000,000 men, upon that basis and upon that theory. The Worcesters, the Norfolks, the Northamptons, the Sussex, the Irish, the Welsh, the Scotch all were recruited, so far as possible, from certain counties or regions, and replaced, so far as possible, from those same regions. The result is that the Suffolks had great pride in their own organization, and tried to outdo and outrival the Sussex battalions. The Scotch, all serving together, rival the Welsh, and the Connaught Rangers, from Ireland, had the same kind of friendly rivalry and spirit and morale. Such a system, Mr. President, makes better soldiers. To have that kind of feeling in a military unit is a great military asset.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senator from New York that at the time the creation of our Army was under consideration this very point was dwelt upon at length in the Committee on Military Affairs. It was very strongly urged there that the system of replacement suggested by the Senator be followed out, that troops be brigaded together and put in divisions with reference to localities and all that; but the advice was evidently disregarded by the high military authorities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is fair to say, Mr. President, that upon making inquiry upon that point from many officers, some of whom deplored the failure to carry out the plan to which the Senator has just referred, and some of whom defended the plan that was being followed, it was asserted that our whole preparation for this war, occurring as it did after we got into the war, had to be so hasty and the Army had to be thrown together and trained so quickly that there was no time to work out a scientific replacement system, and that men had to be treated as automatons; a soldier was merely a soldier and must be sent anywhere and put into any company, no matter whether he knew anybody in that company or not, or taken out of one company and sent 300 miles away and put in some other company. That applied to officers as well as to enlisted men.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see how the plan just suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] could be carried out; but after your units are formed and get into action and a soldier is wounded, does the Senator mean that you should hold that position for him until he has recovered and then return him to that place?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all; not at all. Experience will show that no military unit can ever be kept up to full war strength while it is fighting, while it is in the field. There is always room, and always will be room, for more men in it, up to the authorized maximum strength. At the time of the signing of the armistice you could not find a company or a division or a regiment of ours in France that did not have room for more men. My contention is that if we ever have to repeat this great effort we should try to have that replacement system operate so that those places could be filled by the men who served in that company up to the time that they were wounded, or filled by men who come from the same locality at home.

Mr. HENDERSON. If they are there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If they are available. I would not lose a battle waiting for them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can see where it would be impossible to put anyone in place who might be acquainted with those in that company, so that in some cases it would be an absolute impossibility to carry out that plan.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You can not regulate that by rule of thumb. You can not wage war by rule of thumb. Some people have tried it, and it always results in defeat. But the thing with which I do disagree is the contention made by a great many Regular Army officers that locality pride in a military unit is of no value; and I have argued it with them hour after hour. They insist that a regiment that is recruited without any regard to the prior acquaintance of the enlisted men, without any regard to the localities from which they come, without any pride of locality in addition to their pride as Americans, is just as good as a regiment made up of men who know each other, and who fight side by side, each knowing that the other will take care of him if he is hurt, and write back to his mother.

Mr. HENDERSON. On the same principle as college pride and State pride—along that line?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely. That is where I differ with some of the people in the War Department and people in the American Expeditionary Forces. They deny that there is any advantage in that. I claim that all human experience proves that there is advantage in it, and that every other army tries its best to carry out that same system. I think it should be applied to our Army if it ever should repeat the undertaking of 1918.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it that the Senator does not agree that the order of Gen. Ansell, virtually mustering out the National Guard or doing away with the National Guard is a proper order. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To tell the truth, I have not seen the order. I know nothing about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The order simply provides that the National Guards shall not go back as organizations to the States from which they come, but that they shall be mustered out absolutely, and if there is to be a National Guard the various States will have to organize National Guards in the future.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I see. My remarks did not have reference alone to National Guard units in France. They apply just as much to the so-called draft divisions as they do to the National Guard divisions. There is no difference in principle involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that I agree with the Senator entirely. The Senator recalls that we had identical views on that subject when the matter was before the Military Affairs Committee. We both contended for that at the time, as I recall; and I agree with the Senator absolutely on the proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Senators may remember that I have always been an earnest advocate of universal military training. I believe that we shall have to have it before we ever get a genuine military policy in the United States, so as to be provided with an army that can respond to any emergency—that together with a General Staff. If we are to have a system of universal military training, I hope it will be so arranged that the men selected for that training at a certain age shall be trained in areas marked out geographically, and that when they have finished their training they shall be organized into regiments and divisions whose headquarters for administrative purposes shall be each in a given locality, and that those regiments shall be known as belonging to or coming from those localities, such as a State, or a group of small States if the State by itself is not large enough to supply a complete unit; that they shall be completely federalized; that they shall be under the orders of the Federal Government; but that, in addition to their pride as Americans, in addition to their spirit and their patriotism as Americans, they shall have the added benefit of locality support and locality pride; and in that connection I call the attention of the Senate to a statement made a few days ago by Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, of the Twenty-seventh Division, the New York Guard division. In explanation of the statement let me say that that division to which I have already referred, and also the Thirtieth Division, received scarcely any replacements during those terrific battles. They went into those fights as the New York Division and as the Tennessee-Carolina Division, respectively. They came out of those fights remnants, it is true, of the New York Division and of the Tennessee-Carolina Division. Gen. O'Ryan states that, in his judgment, had not his units possessed that locality pride in addition to their American pride and patriotism, that sympathetic touch of elbow, that teamwork that comes from long acquaintance between men in the ranks who come from the same town or the same street in a great city, they could not have performed the task assigned to them. He counts it, as I think a very large number of military men count it, a vast military asset; and it is a fact which can not be contradicted that the violation of that principle, and the consequent treatment of soldiers whom I have already described this morning as "home boys" as mere automatons who can be put into any division, any regiment, any company, anywhere, is a violation of the humanities and injures the efficiency of the soldier; and when it does that it injures the efficiency of the unit in which he serves.

Mr. President, the great contest is over. We did our full share at the end. My observations upon this point are in retrospect, in a sense, and are given for what they are worth when the Senate comes to the consideration of military legislation which eventually must reach the statute books.

I want to mention one other topic, and that is the effect of the order of November 11 upon the American Expeditionary Force.

Senators will remember that an order was issued, immediately upon the signing of the armistice, forbidding all promotions from that time on. I never have been able to find out the reason for the order. It may have very good reasons back of it. I know something of its effect upon the spirits of the men. It was most regrettable. It had a very profound effect. Many a lieutenant, Mr. President, was commanding a battalion in the Argonne Forest, had commanded troops in action for days and days, his own captain and major having been killed or wounded. He was entitled to some recognition. But it was impossible for his commanding officer to make out the required papers in the heat of action, with men scrambling through that wilderness, fighting day and night. That had to be postponed until the regiment or the unit could settle down somewhere in a quiet place and give the commanding officer a chance to catch up with his paper work and send in his recommendations. Scores and scores of those young men shouldered and carried responsibilities higher than those of the grade which they occupied. In scores and scores of cases their commanding officer had prepared the papers recommending them for promotion. They could not be gotten in by November 11. On November 11 comes the order saying that no one shall be promoted, and all the machinery of promotion was stopped.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I agree with the Senator from New York as to the harmful effects of that order. On yesterday the Chief of Staff was before the Military Affairs Committee to testify in regard to a bill which had been introduced commissioning the men who had been recommended before the 11th of November, and the explanation which he made to the committee was that these promotions were not made because there were no vacancies; that the Army, its size, its officers, and everything relating to it, was fixed by an act of Congress; and that it was not within the power of the War Department to make promotions unless there were vacancies.

Now, I do not undertake to say whether there were or were not vacancies in some particular organization, but I think that would be a technical objection to making the promotions. Do not understand, however, that it would move me in being opposed to legislation which would enable those men to receive the promotions which they had earned, and which I think could be done without any very great difficulty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I regret that I was not at the hearing referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts. I was tremendously surprised to learn that there were no vacancies in the commissioned personnel of the Army. It seems to me that there must be some vacancies. It is inevitable that with such an enormous organization there shall be vacancies in the commissioned personnel. I am not contending that all the officers recommended for promotion by their respective commanding officers should receive promotion, but I do think it was a mistake to stop all the machinery of promotion—to say that no one shall be promoted. The effect was to discourage and disappoint men. They thought, "We have no more chance. It is gone. The war is over. We went in as first lieutenants. We did our work. Our captain was wounded. We commanded the company. Our major was wounded. We commanded the battalion. Now our Government says that we shall never be anything but first lieutenants"—unless, indeed, it is contemplated that when that young man is mustered out, many months from now, he shall be mustered out with an advanced rank. The sweetness will be largely lacking, Mr. President, in that kind of promotion.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In further explanation of what took place yesterday—does it inconvenience the Senator to be interrupted?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all. I desire to conclude very soon, however.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very brief. I want to say that I thoroughly concur with the views which the Senator has just expressed. I have a bill which virtually does away with the order of November 11, 1918, and it was about this bill that the Chief of Staff testified yesterday. He testified as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, but in addition he said that it was expected to promote these men on the reserve list. The question which I wish to propound to the Senator, in view of what he has seen and heard over there, and his knowledge of the facts as they exist among the officers, is this: Does he think that promoting men on a reserve list will have the effect of properly promoting these men who have earned their promotions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is hard to estimate, of course, the comparative value of the two promotions that we are discussing. Of course, the longer it is postponed, the less it means to the man. There is nothing that so delights an officer's heart, nothing that so delights the hearts of the men who have served under him, as recognition, if possible, upon the field of battle, or as soon thereafter as possible. The longer it is postponed the less it means.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In addition to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said about the hearing before the committee yesterday, I call the Senator's attention to page 2107 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, where there appears a letter from the Secretary of War on exactly the same subject, and giving the reasons for the course that was pursued. I am frank to say that after having read that letter, and after having heard Gen. March's testimony at considerable length, my views were changed as to the power of the War Department; and I think to promote these men to the rank for which they have been recommended will just promote a number of officers to vacancies where there is no place for them to go.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not contended for that. I have not contended for the promotion of all these men. The only criticism I have had to make is that all the machinery for promotion is arbitrarily stopped, and no one can be promoted, whereas there must be vacancies, and there always will be some. It is the blanket character of the order that created the discouragement and the dismay. If an order had been sent out to the effect that no promotions should be made except to fill vacancies, the Army would have understood it; but, as I understand it, the order went out saying, "There shall be no promotions anywhere."

Mr. McKELLAR. They were all stopped.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to add just one word to what the Senator from Oregon has said. I think he is right in the conclusion which he has reached. I believe we owe it to these men, who have performed conspicuous service, to see that in some way they shall receive the rewards for which they have been recommended, and, as the Senator from New York has very justly said, the sooner that is done the better. Any delay means taking away something from the value of the reward which is given.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was about to conclude my remarks. I regret that I have kept the Senate so long. One can not help but admire the achievement that is recorded in France by the American Expeditionary Force. Of course, from time to time criticism will be leveled against some of the things they did or failed to do, but the balance is distinctly upon the credit side of the ledger. The task which confronted them was enormous.

My words here this morning have not commenced to describe—I doubt if any one man knows enough about it or has the power of language adequate to describe—the scenes and the conditions through which that Expeditionary Force operated. Those devastated regions, those ghostly cities of the dead, town after town, village after village, hamlet after hamlet, farmhouse after farmhouse, all in utter, hopeless ruin. Our people had to traverse that, to live in that atmosphere, to encounter all kinds of hard conditions. So did the British; so did the French. One can understand, let me say in passing, something of the feeling of the French people when one has seen the devastated regions in France. Dozens and dozens of magazine articles have been written about it, hundreds of speeches have been delivered about it, and thousands of dispatches have come over the wires describing it, and each and every one of them is inadequate. No spoken word or written word can commence to describe that condition. When one can go along a road in France, reach a fork in the road in the center of some little wrecked town, and stop a French soldier and ask him the way to the next town and have him tell you that he lives in that very neighborhood and can not find his own way home, then one may understand the extent of that wreckage. When one may be taken to the battle field of Verdun and conducted to a ridge near Fort de Souville and have a French officer ask one, "Would you like to see the village of Fleury," and when one replies, "Yes; where is it?" and he says, "You are standing in the middle of it," then one may have some comprehension of what France has suffered. Not a single brick of that village left; all ground to powder, returned to the earth from which they came. Tortured earth, shattered rock, not a tree, not a bush, not a weed, a tumultuous sea of upturned earth and rubbish.

The world will never know what this means to France, for every piece of property that was destroyed in that vast area belonged to some little French family. The French are a home-owning people. Every bit of that ground is owned by some French family, if that family is surviving, some one has title to it, and to see them going back to those regions, those refugees actually trying to find where they used to live, is enough to break one's heart.

Such is only a part of the picture of the crime that Germany inflicted upon France and upon civilization—a war deliberately planned, a war with the deliberate purpose of destroying not only the French soldiers and the British soldiers and lately the American soldiers but every atom of French property that could be destroyed in such a way as to handicap and cripple the French nation for generations to come. They took the machinery out of the factories or destroyed it in order to prevent Belgians and French from being their rivals again in commercial pursuits. That is why they shelled towns after they retired from those towns and when there was nothing left in them but civilians. That is why they poured gas shells into the little village of Bohain, from which they had retired and which contained 700 civilians and no allied troops, and choked to death women and children. That was done in 1918 within six weeks of the signing of the armistice. That is why they would cunningly hide under the carpet in a poor woman's kitchen a detonating fuse taken from a 5.9 shell, hide it under the carpet in a little crack in the floor, and leave it there for her to strike some day by accident and suffer mutilation. This was done in many instances. They put hand grenades under the bodies of their own dead, so that when a British soldier came along and lifted up the dead German to bury him he would be blown to atoms.

When we come to discuss terms of peace, Senators, when we come to discuss the treatment that is to be accorded to the German people, and these things were done by German people, if we are wise, we will take into consideration the feelings of the French people and the Belgian people. Since the days of Julius Cæsar France has stood in dread of the hordes of barbarians that have poured from time to time out of the northern forests. Since the days of Julius Cæsar scarcely a century has gone by but what she has been called upon to repulse those Teutonic hordes. All she wants is security. She wants something to be brought about in these peace terms that will make it impossible for the German hordes to repeat this tragedy, and that is all.

The German people to-day—I believe it as I know that I am standing on this floor—have no conception of the feelings of other nations toward them. They have no feeling of humiliation or remorse, not one bit. They are sorry that they have lost the war, but their ideals are purely materialistic. There is no tribulation of the spirit.

I rejoice that we sent over there 2,000,000 men, who, hastily trained and hastily organized as they were, contributed to this great victory. We helped win this war; all four of the great nations won it together.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Speaking of the Germans, the Senator has said that their ideals have not changed, that they regret having lost the war, and only feel humiliated that they have lost it. Does the Senator think that they have been so whipped that it will be unnecessary to maintain a force there in order to hold them in order and eventually to humiliate them, if that time comes?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My own opinion is, and I remind the Senator it is only my opinion, that Germany in a military sense is absolutely prostrate to-day; that she can not possibly renew the war. Her whole fleet is gone, a large proportion of the rolling stock of the railways, a large proportion of the airplanes, a large proportion of her guns, a large proportion of her motor trucks. She could not move an army qualified to compete with either the French, British, or American armies as they stood on November 11. She is prostrate in a military sense.

It depends, Mr. President, upon the conditions contained in the terms of peace how soon Germany can recover in a military sense. I do not know what those terms will be; I think none of us know; but I am somewhat dismayed that the Germans themselves exhibit no sign of sorrow or remorse or humiliation, that they still continue to view this whole matter from the most materialistic viewpoint. They made a bid for world power and they used every weapon, no matter how savage it was, to get it, and having failed to get it they regret the failure, but not the use of the weapons. And unless a great change comes over the heart and soul of German people, if they are led again as they were led in 1914, to start another war, I believe they would wage it in exactly the same way.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think that the change in their form of government will make any difference in the military ambitions of the German people?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not convinced of that.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit one question along the line indicated by the Senators who have just interrogated him?

In view of the unsettled condition of Germany and of the mental attitude of the people, their lack of appreciation of the enormity of their crime, their materialistic point of view, does not the Senator think it becomes imperative for a considerable length of time that the allies shall keep in Germany, around and about Germany, a large number of troops to police, to enforce the guaranties and exactions that will find place in the peace treaty?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question of the Senator is very difficult to answer, because the answer has to be conditioned upon so many events that are yet to happen, most important of which are the terms of peace itself. The question might be answered with a reasonable degree of accuracy if we knew now what the terms of peace will be. In any event, the terms of peace must see to it that the crime of 1914 shall not be and can not be repeated by Germany or any of her allies.

I rose in the first place, Mr. President, to state in an inadequate way my admiration for the way in which the American Expeditionary Force was handled. As Senators who have taken an interest in this matter, who have worked at this end of the line as hard as we could to support and help them, and as Americans, I know we are proud, as we ought to be proud, of that splendid force and the achievements that they have placed upon the record of American history.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have had it in mind to submit some ideas and suggestions of my own concerning the reorganization of the Army. The address which has just been delivered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], to which we have all listened with such interest and so much benefit, has made the subject particularly opportune, and I should like, under ordinary circumstances, to proceed with my remarks at this time. But, Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, I realize that there is before the Senate a bill of transcendent importance, as I regard it, and I am not willing to interpose anything that will interfere with the immediate consideration of that measure.

I therefore content myself at this time by saying that at the earliest opportunity I shall ask for the privilege of presenting the remarks, and in connection therewith I shall submit a bill.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. POLLOCK. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the narrative of the war by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. It is as he states, largely in retrospect. I merely rise to give notice that on to-morrow, immediately after the morning business, I shall endeavor to submit a few remarks looking to the future and as to what should be the course of this Government with reference to the creation of a league of nations for the maintenance of the peace of the world.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Spencer
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Calder	Kellogg	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Culberson	King	Pittman	Thompson
Cummins	Kirby	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	Knox	Pollock	Trammell
Fletcher	La Follette	Pomerene	Vardaman
France	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Reed	Warren
Gay	McLean	Saulsbury	Weeks
Gore	McNary	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gronna	Martin, Ky.	Sheppard
Hale	Moses	Sherman
Henderson	Myers	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. POLLOCK. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is detained by illness.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, on January 20 I sent to the desk an amendment to House bill 13274. Yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] introduced that amendment to the bill. In order to protect my amendment, I submit an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska and also one to what is known as the Chamberlain bill, so as to perfect the proposed amendment that I had printed the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be ordered printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would be proper to take up the bill as reported by the committee and have it read for the purpose of amendment. The bill has not yet been read, and I suggest that it be read for the purpose of amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the substitute bill.

The Secretary read the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu to insert:

That whenever during the war emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, any individual, firm, company, corporation or foreign government has made an agreement with the Secretary of War, or with any officer or agent acting under his authority, or with any agency of the Government authorized to procure or aid in procuring the same for the War Department, for the production, manufacture, sale, acquisition, or control of equipment, materials, or supplies, or for services, or for facilities, or other purposes connected with the prosecution of the war, and such agreement was reduced to the form of a contract or accepted procurement order and executed or signed on behalf of the Government, but the agreement did not comply with statutory requirements, in every such case the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to waive, on behalf of the Government, such noncompliance: Provided, That he finds such waiver is not inconsistent with the public interest, and in this event the said agreement shall have the same validity and effect it would have had if such statutory requirement had been complied with.

That whenever, prior to said November 12, 1918, any individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign Government has made any agreement, oral or written, express or implied, with, or has received any order or request, oral or written, from, the Secretary of War, or any officer, agent, or agency as aforesaid, for any of the purposes aforesaid, and the same has not been reduced to contract form, but such individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign Government has in good faith made expenditures, incurred obligations, acquired or furnished facilities, equipment, materials, or supplies, or rendered services, in reliance on such agreement, order, or request, in every such case the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, on behalf of the Government, to enter into such contract with such individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign Government as will, under all the circumstances, fairly and equitably compensate him or it for the expenditures made, obligations incurred, equipment, materials, or supplies furnished or acquired, or services rendered, as aforesaid: Provided, That in no event shall such contract provide for compensation on terms more favorable than the terms, if any, for which the aforesaid agreement, order, or request may have provided.

That whenever, prior to said November 12, 1918, the War Department, through its officers or agents, has taken possession of any land, or whenever the holder or owner of any land has removed from or removed any improvements from such land at the order or request of the War Department and no valid contract has been made with respect thereto, then the Secretary of War, if he finds that the public interest does not require the possession or occupancy of such land by the Government, is authorized to make compensation to the owner or holder thereof for the fair value of such improvements so removed and the expense incurred by such owner in removing therefrom or for the fair value of the use of such land of which the War Department has taken actual possession and for any expense or loss incurred by the owner or holder by reason of such possession.

SEC. 2. That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the War Contracts Appeals Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), which shall be composed of three members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall continue in office for one year from the date of this act. One member of the commission shall represent the War Department, one member shall represent the Department of Justice, and one member shall represent the business interests of the country. None of the members of the commission shall be interested in any order, contract, or agreement within the purview of this act or have any interest in any firm or corporation having such orders, contracts, or agreements. Each member of the commission shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, payable in the same manner as the salaries of judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall choose a chairman from its own membership and may appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary not exceeding $5,000 a year, to be determined by the commission and payable in the same manner as the salaries of the members of the commission.

That there is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the reasonable expenses of the commission, including the payment of salaries herein authorized, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $50,000.

That within 30 days of the date when the Secretary of War tenders any contract or compensation as provided in this act, or refuses to tender such contract or compensation, the party to whom said contract or compensation is tendered or refused, or the Government by a duly authorized officer from the Department of Justice may file with the chairman of the commission a notice of appeal: Provided, however, That if the representative of the Department of Justice agrees with the action of the War Department there shall be no appeal by the Government, but settlement can be made at once. Thereupon, the commission shall proceed to examine and review the facts and circumstances of the case and make its award or finding thereon. Upon giving receipt in full of all demands against the United States arising out of the transaction by reason of which the award is made, the appellant shall be entitled to receive the amount of any award so made, and the proper officer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same, but if the appellant is dissatisfied with the amount so awarded he shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount awarded and shall be entitled to sue the United States in the Court of Claims to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent shall make up such amount as will be fair and just compensation as provided in this act, and the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction to hear said suit and render judgment therein.

That whenever any dispute arises in the matter of the adjustment or settlement, or as the interpretation or application of the terms, of any contract which has been made for any of the purposes set forth in this act, and in the execution of which there has been compliance with statutory requirements, the contractor or the Government by a duly authorized officer from the Department of Justice may give notice to the Secretary of War of intention to appeal to the commission, and provided notice of appeal is filed with the chairman of the commission within 30 days: Provided, however, That if the representative of the Department of Justice agrees with the action of the War Department there shall be no appeal by the Government but settlement can be made at once. On an appeal being taken the commission shall thereupon proceed to determine the questions at issue as set forth in said notice of appeal; and the contractor shall be entitled either to receive the whole amount of such award as may be made as in full of his claim on the questions submitted or 75 per cent of the same and sue the United States in the Court of Claims for any remainder, all as provided next above as to agreements otherwise within the purview of this act.

That in executing the duties and powers conferred by this act the commission may make its own rules and regulations and may hear and determine issues informally. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to furnish to the commission such evidence, documents, or papers pertaining to transactions as to which notice of appeal has been filed as the commission may request. The commission is authorized, in its discretion, to appoint an examiner in any region or district when such region is within the United States where, in its judgment, the taking of additional testimony is necessary to the determination of any case. Such examiner shall be a resident of the region or district for which he is appointed, and shall not have any interest, directly or indirectly, in any contract or transaction coming before him or receive any compensation save and except such per diem compensation and expenses as shall be fixed by the commission. Whenever the commission shall refer to any such examiner any claim presented hereunder, the examiner shall proceed, under the direction of the commission, to hear the parties, take the proofs, and return the same to the commission with his recommendations thereon as promptly as possible.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to validate any such contract unless the officer who was at the time of the making of such contract the chief of the division or bureau, as the case may be, in which said contract was negotiated, or, in the event that such officer was not responsible for the making of such contract, then the officer in such division or bureau who was so responsible, together with the officer who signed said contract, shall each severally make and subscribe to an affidavit in writing, giving the definite terms of such contract, the name or names within his knowledge, of any such officer or officers who took part in the negotiation or making of the same, and stating whether or not within his knowledge any officer aiding in such making was interested, directly or indirectly, in said contract, and in addition subscribing to an oath to be appended to said affidavit in substantially the following form and tenor:

"I, ———, Chief of the Division or Bureau (naming it) in which the contract hereinbefore mentioned was negotiated, at the time of negotiation thereof, and the officer in the Division or Bureau (naming it) responsible for the making of the contract hereinbefore mentioned, and I, ———, the officer who actually signed said contract, do hereby each severally swear that I am not and was not at the time of the making of said contract directly or indirectly interested in said contract."

That in respect to any such contract as to which any one of said officers can not take the foregoing oath, or after diligent search or inquiry by the contractor can not be found, or is at the time actually engaged in foreign service, or refuses to take said oath, then upon such facts and the fact required in the oath of such officer, appearing by an affidavit of the contractor, or of one of its partners, chief officers, or chief agents acting in its behalf, the Secretary of War shall promptly report such contract to the War Contracts Appeals Commission and furnish to said commission such evidence, documents, and papers pertaining to the transaction as may be within his control, and such commission may request, and original jurisdiction is hereby vested in, said commission to hear and determine said claim with the powers and upon the procedure hereinbefore described in this act. Said commission shall make its award or finding thereon and deny said claim or grant it in whole or in part, according to the justice and equity thereof, and the award or finding shall have the same force and effect and create the same rights as if made under the provisions of section 3 of this act. And it shall be the further duty of said commission in hearing, investigating, and determining such claim to find and determine whether any of such officers is or was at the time of making of said contract directly or indirectly interested in said contract.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the Government from prosecution under the penal statutes of the United States for any fraud, criminal conduct, illegality, or irregularity in connection with any of the agreements or orders referred to herein or the execution or signing thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if it is in order, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, on page 10, line 5, to strike out the period and make a semicolon, and to add what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 5, before the period, and after the word "possible," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That in no case, however, shall any award either by the Secretary of War or by the commission or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and a remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the provision that is in the Hitchcock amendment, and it should be inserted here. I think no one will say that there should be a payment for prospective or speculative profits. This is the matter as to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and others argued on yesterday, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the provision.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think I have no objection to the first part of the amendment, but the latter part of the amendment is even broader than the Senator from Wisconsin argued for. I do not think it ought to be included in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment proposed by Mr. McKELLAR.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The latter part of the amendment I am not willing to accept.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are the words to which the Senator from Oregon objects the words "and a remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Take one illustration. I understand that in some cases the Government of the United States has insisted that a contractor shall go ahead and use patents that had been obtained and issued in the names of other parties, and that the Government would stand behind the contractors to defend them against any proceedings that might be instituted to recover penalties or royalties. I think the Senator's amendment goes to an extent that it would preclude recovery in cases of that kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so. If the Senator will look at lines 10, 11, and 12, I think he will find the language there is sufficient to include the objects which the Senator suggests. It provides for remuneration. It requires the Government to make "remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled." I should think that that language would be broad enough.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It in part nullifies the provisions of the bill, just as it nullifies the provisions of the Hitchcock bill itself, if it be inserted in it. It ought not to be in here. I am perfectly willing to accept that portion of the amendment which refers to prospective or possible profits on unperformed portions of a contract. I think that is as far as it ought to go.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator from Tennessee suffer an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand the effect of this amendment would be the same practically as section 6 of the Hitchcock substitute?

Mr. McKELLAR. It merely includes the Secretary of War. It is the exact wording of the Hitchcock substitute, except that the words "and the Secretary of War" are added for the purpose of making it apply to the Chamberlain bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am not defending the validation of any unearned profits, nor do I believe that any of the great profits which might accrue to a contractor by reason of the validation of a contract or a contract that can not be canceled should be paid, but there are certain contracts which, I understand, have been made by the Secretary of War—verbal agreements, probably some of them agreements by letter—that involve an adjustment of profits. I do not know what those contracts are. I only know that the Secretary of War states that some of those contracts have been made by reason of the fact that the department had to induce contractors to change their method of manufacture, to change their machinery, to enlarge their plants, and that certain promises and assurances have been made to those contractors.

Now, I want this bill so written that it shall not repudiate those agreements; that those agreements may be adjusted either by the Secretary of War or by this proposed commission. A repudiation of any agreement of that character would involve the good faith of the Government when it has been pledged by an agent of the Government.

I wrote to the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell. I might say, if I am not encroaching too much on the Senator's time in this connection, the Assistant Secretary of War has given a great deal of attention to the adjustment of these contracts, and he has accomplished a great deal in ascertaining the facts regarding them. Many of them are ready for settlement as soon as they are validated. In reply to my query, the Assistant Secretary of War sent me the letter which I hold in my hand, in regard to section 6 of the Hitchcock bill, which is practically the same in effect as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. I desire to ask the Secretary to read this letter, if the Senator from Tennessee has no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
DIRECTOR OF MUNITIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You have asked my views as to the effect of section 6 of the Hitchcock bill. This bill gives to a proposed commission complete jurisdiction over the adjustments of all contracts, valid and invalid, entered into by the War Department for war supplies which are suspended, canceled, or terminated prior to complete execution, by reason of the termination of hostilities. Section 6 provides that neither the commission nor the Court of Claims shall make any allowance in such cases for any profit to the contractor other than on goods and supplies actually delivered to the United States with the remuneration for expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to perform the contract or order that is canceled. Under this provision, though a contractor may have employed large amounts of his capital and months of hard work upon the work in process, he is to be permitted no reward whatever for such use of his capital and for such services where the contract is terminated before the actual delivery of supplies. In the event that any supplies are delivered his reward is limited to that part of his capital and services which go to the completion of those supplies, and no reward is permitted for the use of that part of his capital and his services which are embodied in work in process, the completion of which is abandoned at the direction of the Government. Such a restriction would involve direct violation of obligations entered into by the American Expeditionary Force with foreign governments and with the citizens of foreign countries, and would cast a reflection upon the good name of this Government, which I believe Congress would regret just as much as this department.

As to contracts in this country, the standard termination clause in use by the department provides for the allowance to the contractor of a certain percentage of the cost to the contractor of materials, unfinished articles of work in process, and component parts furnished by the contractor and on hand, which are in compliance with provisions of the contract and specifications. This allowance is by way of compensation for the use of the capital furnished by the contractor and the services rendered by him in the performance of work for the Government which at its instance is not completed.

It seems to me that section 6 would impair the obligation of such contracts. The good faith of the Government seems equally involved where work has been undertaken by contractors on the faith of receiving a contract in this form and where the armistice has interposed to prevent its actual execution.

Very truly, yours,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
The Assistant Secretary of War, Director of Munitions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Assistant Secretary of War is mistaken when he refers to my bill as covering legal contracts. One of the differences between the bill proposed by me and the substitute reported by the committee is that mine is limited to those cases in which the contracts are defective or the orders are informal. The House bill, like my bill, only covers those cases. It does not attempt to cover cases where there is a legal contract providing the terms under which it may be adjusted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, who has some suggestion to make about the matter, I believe.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to suggest to the Senator that, while his amendment as incorporated in the Hitchcock amendment covered only contracts defectively executed, when offered as an amendment to the committee bill it also covers contracts fully executed in compliance with all statutory requirements. I do not believe the Senator would desire to have Congress abrogate a legal right, and I therefore wish to ask the Senator whether he will not accept an amendment to his amendment adding these words:

Provided, The foregoing shall not apply to any contract executed in compliance with all statutory requirements.

Mr. McKELLAR. That amendment will be entirely satisfactory, although I think the same result could be perhaps accomplished by having my amendment read:

That in no case of a contract validated by this act—

And so forth. Probably that would make it shorter; but the Senator's amendment covers it absolutely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin will have to qualify his proposed amendment to the amendment. I understand that there are some contracts entirely legal in form which contain no provision for cancellation and the settlement of damages; so that the only exception should be those cases covered by contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Nebraska is entirely right about that. As I recall the testimony, there are only a very small number of contracts legally drawn and executed that have the cancellation provision; in other words, I think only until recently, I think in October——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In July.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oregon corrects me, and I am sure that he knows the fact—in July they adopted a new form of contract, which contained a cancellation provision. All the contracts up to that time contained no cancellation provision.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he thinks that as to any contract that is legally executed Congress now can change the measure of damages to which a contractor may be entitled?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is perhaps true. When a contract has already been signed and is valid, while Congress under the Constitution can impair the obligation of such a contract, yet we do not permit the States to do so, and therefore it would not be proper for us to do so, either as a matter of policy or on any other ground.

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate that. If an amendment is in order, Mr. President, I will offer such as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then I wish to ask the Senator whether he will not accept another amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps it would be better to have the amendment already presented adopted.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask to have the amendment to the amendment again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. McKELLAR, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, The foregoing shall not apply to any contract executed in compliance with all statutory requirements.

So that it will read:

That in no case, however, shall any award, either by the Secretary of War or by the commission or the Court of Claims, include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and a remuneration for expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled: Provided, The foregoing shall not apply to any contract executed in compliance with all statutory requirements.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement with reference to the letter written by the Assistant Secretary of War. I do not agree with his construction of section 6. I do not know whether or not the Assistant Secretary of War, who is a very fine gentleman, is a lawyer; but if he is, he has very incorrectly interpreted the meaning, as I believe, of section 6, because I think the last three lines in section 6 cover exactly the case which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] suggested awhile ago, where it provides that such proper remuneration can be made. Section 6 does cut out prospective or possible profits, and I think it ought to do so. There ought not to be any prospective or possible profits allowed in these settlements.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Possibly the Senator is correct. My anxiety is only to avoid any statutory prohibition which will work an injustice on a contractor who, in good faith, has gone ahead and expended his capital in order to provide materials upon an order from the Secretary of War.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I join him in that. I am just as anxious to protect the rights of contractors as anyone else could be; and I think they ought to be protected. At the same time I think the rights of the Government should be protected in like manner and a provision should be enacted that will be fair for all alike.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not seeking to have the Government's rights invaded in any way whatsoever.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure of that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But I am informed by the Secretary of War that there are certain contracts—verbal contracts, I believe—which have been made, where assurances have been given to the contractor of certain profits, where no cancellation has been agreed upon. In order to get the materials and supplies, they have been compelled to give a quantity order; and they feel that when they cancel that order, having no agreement as to cancellation, there should be some adjustment as to profits without their being compelled to take the full order which they agreed to take. Does the Senator understand the situation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that situation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Now, I claim that if the Secretary of War has made any such agreement involving the payment of profits, which according to the technical provisions of this act may be unearned, it is unfair to write such a prohibitory section in this law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand the Senator to mean that the Secretary of War has entered into a contract giving to the contractor prospective or possible profits on the unearned portions of the contract? It is inconceivable to me that the Secretary of War would do such a thing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that there have been some orders given for a certain quantity of materials—let us assume, for illustration, a million yards of cloth. The manufacturer has bought the machinery and increased his facilities.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all provided for here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Secretary of War has stated that he would take that million yards of cloth, and the contractor has practically figured his profits on that million yards of cloth upon the assurance that the Secretary of War would accept delivery. Now, there is no provision for cancellation.

Does the Senator believe that that contractor should be prohibited from receiving his profits on that million yards of cloth when he has bought the materials and put the machinery in his plant?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me see if I understand the Senator. If I understand the Senator correctly, I most certainly do believe that the Secretary of War ought not to permit any such possible profits to be allowed to the contractor.

Let us assume that a mill has put in $5,000 worth of machinery on a very large order and it is only out the $5,000, and that much of the machinery can be used by the contractor, as shown by the facts, and if he had carried out his entire contract with the Government he would have had half a million dollars of profits. Does the Senator mean to say that we ought to validate a contract that would permit this contractor on an expenditure of $5,000 for machinery which he still owns to reap from the Government $500,000 of possible or expected profits?

If that is what the Senator means, I most emphatically say I do not agree to any such proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, the Senator has inflated the figures somewhat, but I do not mean to assume that at all. I mean that when the Secretary of War has given a contractor the assurance that he will make certain profits by giving him a quantity order, and he has expended for machinery or for changes in his mill an amount of money practically in excess of the profit to be derived, it is a proper case for adjustment, and possibly some unearned profits may have to be paid in order to do justice to that contractor. Therefore I say that cases of this character should be subject to an appeal to the commission and should not be made the subject of a prohibitory statute.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield; surely.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me ask the Senator what he would do in a case of this kind, which I put by way of illustration, where a contractor has been contracted with to supply a very large amount of shells, for instance. He goes to work and he supplies the Government one-half of the goods in that line that he has already manufactured and has on the ground. What is the Senator going to do with a man of that kind? This amendment provides that there shall be no profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator misinterprets the language.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. McKELLAR (reading)—

Beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is one, and what else? Why—

A remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order.

That takes in all that the Senator means.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I beg the Senator's pardon. The first part of his provision provides only for the reimbursement of the contractor for the goods actually manufactured, delivered to, supplied, and received by the Government. Now, where these goods are on the ground and have not been delivered or accepted there is no compensation provided for at all.

The latter part of this section to which the Senator calls attention has reference to the expenditures made by a man to increase his plant, for instance; and if the Senator is looking to the protection of the Government, he mulcts the Government by that last provision. Why?

Suppose a manufacturer or contractor has gone to work and spent a million dollars in the enlargement of his plant. That has been necessary to carry out the contract that he had with the Government. Now, then, the Government cancels his contract. He has not used or utilized the extended plant, and the Government must pay him for all of it, notwithstanding there may be a very large salvage. Now, there is the instance where the Government is imposed upon, and in the first part of it the contractor is imposed upon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the Senator does not get at the real meaning of this section.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. Let me reply to the Senator from Oregon for just a moment. I will read the language:

That in no case, however, shall any award, either by the Secretary of War or by the commission or the Court of Claims, include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract—

Now, wait a minute. We are not talking now about real profits. We are not limiting the real profits that are made on it. We are limiting, in the latter part of this section, only the possible or prospective profits. That is the only limitation that is in this section—

Prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and—

In addition to that—a remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

Under that provision—and I will yield to the Senator from Ohio in just a moment—every justice can be done the contractor. He is remunerated, given his real profit; full justice can be done to him, full justice can be done to the Government; but it does not provide that he shall receive the kind of profits that I have suggested a few moments ago, where a man puts $5,000, for instance, into the increase of his plant on an order that might involve a million dollars when completed. It might take two or three years to complete it. He may have a half million dollars of prospective profits if he completes the order, but he has put only $5,000 into it. It may be that he has put only $1,000 into it, to use an extreme case; and yet is it to be arranged so that he can, under the terms of this validating act, receive $500,000 of prospective profits?

I do not think the Senator contends that he should do it. I say that we ought to pay the contractor liberally; we ought to pay him well; we ought to pay him everything that is due him and give him a profit on it; but we ought not to give him a possible or prospective profit on unearned portions of his contract. This is what this section prohibits, and it ought to be adopted.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think certainly the Senator will have to amend his proposed amendment quite a good deal.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will offer some amendments that will be good, I shall be delighted to accept them.

Mr. POMERENE. I will make a suggestion that I know the Senator will think is right.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will admit anything that is right to carry out that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Suppose, as a matter of fact, a concern is manufacturing cannon. They have to go through many processes, I understand. I do not know anything about the manufacture of them. They may have their shops filled with cannon that are half completed. They have not been delivered to or accepted by the Government. They are there in an uncompleted state. The material of the contractor is in them, and a large part of his labor is in them. Now, it does seem to me that the contractor ought to be allowed a reasonable profit upon that work and material, even if the goods have not as yet been delivered to or accepted by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is not any difference between the Senator and myself on that subject. If the Senator will read this provision carefully and give it the care that he usually does, being the very able lawyer that he is, I am quite sure there will be no difference between us on that subject. This section refers to prospective or possible profits. It refers to daydreams of contractors—a man who has a contract of $100,000 and expects to make a million dollars out of it, especially if he has not done the work. It just does away with that kind of thing; but it does not prevent the contractor from getting the profits to which he is entitled.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not on the goods which are delivered, but it does prevent his getting any profits on the goods that are only half completed. That is my objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it is only prospective or possible profits. That is all it refers to.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator. I was about to yield the floor. I will yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to ask this question of the Senator from Tennessee, because he has the faculty of very clear statement, and I am deeply interested in this bill, because there are a good many people in my State who are in grave danger of suffering a loss which they can not easily bear.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I am the last man in the world to make any contractor bear a loss which he should not bear.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know much about these matters. The members of the Military Affairs Committee are a great deal more competent than I am to apply this language to the actual cases. What I should like to know is this, and I ask it both in regard to the committee amendment and in regard to the proposed Hitchcock amendment:

Is it the purpose of the proposer of the amendment to put those who have entered into contracts or partial contracts with the Government in precisely the same situation or condition as though the acts which had been performed by both parties had been performed between private individuals and allow the individual to recover from the Government the damages or losses upon recognized principles of the law which would be recoverable if the same things had been done between two persons instead of between a person and the Government? If the Senator from Tennessee will explain that to me, I shall be a good deal better able to follow the language of these bills and reach a conclusion as to which one will be most equitable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall take great pleasure in giving the Senator my views.

Generally speaking, that is the purpose of both bills. They can not be put in the same position as those who have valid contracts. To illustrate what I mean, the greater portion of these properly signed contracts are contracts without any cancellation clause at all. A grosser piece of negligence can hardly be imagined. Here we have given unlimited sums of money to the departments to furnish lawyers, and how, even by accident, a cancellation clause could have been left out of the contracts it is difficult to see.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me make this statement to the Senator about that: The Secretary advises me that a great many of the contracts made prior to the 1st of July last had the cancellation clause in them, but that since that time all of them have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, that is not the proof before our subcommittee; that is all I can say. The proof before our subcommittee is that comparatively few of the valid contracts have the cancellation clause.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will ask the Senator to make that just a little clearer to me about the cancellation. Does the Senator mean a cancellation clause that would permit the termination of the contract without any damages?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; providing for the damages and providing the conditions and methods of procedure and all about how they should be computed. All of those things are provided for in the cancellation clause; and in every contract that is prepared by a lawyer there is a cancellation provision, as every lawyer knows. As I say, it is absolutely inconceivable to me why they were not in all the contracts; but they are not, and we need not bother about the water that has passed the mill.

I might say to the Senator right there that, of course, any validating of a contract that has a cancellation clause in it but is improperly signed would not put it on an exact equality with the good contract, the properly executed contract, that has no cancellation clause; so we can not put them back exactly as they were. It is impossible to do that. What is proposed by both bills, however, is to see that every contractor in this country who has done work for this Government shall be fully and amply paid. We want them to receive a profit on what they have done for the Government. The subcommittee of which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and myself were members, pursued that policy. It was the purpose of the committee to do it; and we instituted this commission, following out the precedent, because there was after the Civil War, as I understand, a commission with independent authority and original jurisdiction created for that purpose; and then after the Spanish-American War there was an independent commission, just such a one as the Hitchcock amendment undertakes to create here, provided to do exact justice, as far as that could be done, between the Government and the contractor. There is not a purpose on the part of anyone to do anything that is unjust. It is merely a difference of opinion as to how it can best be done.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator excuse me just a moment? I have a matter that I want to bring before the Senate, and then I will yield to him.

Now, I say "all contracts." There is one class of contracts that both amendments except from that rule, and that is contracts that have been fraudulently made or contracts that have been made contrary to the statutes—not simply not carrying out the statutes but that have been made in violation of the statutes, which are equivalent to fraudulent contracts. The bill, in the fourth section, I believe, or the third section, provides what shall be done even in the case of those contracts; for instance, where a concern sent its officer down here, and he became a dollar-a-year man, and then, after that, became an officer of the Army.

For instance, take the one that is in the RECORD to-day, if you gentlemen are interested in it, and will look it up—the case of John C. McCubbin, who was an officer of the Standard Sanitary Co., recommended by the officers of that firm to come down here and become a purchasing agent for the Government in connection with enamel ware. He came down here, became a major in that department, bought all of his goods from the concern which he represented, and is going back, as soon as he is released, to that concern. I think there was something like $800,000 worth bought from that concern and $34,000 worth bought from all the other concerns of like kind in the country. Maj. McCubbin, according to the proof here, was not representing the Government, though he was an officer sworn to represent it, but he was virtually an officer of the United States representing his own concern.

A Senator asks me if he called for bids. Oh, no; he simply bought outright from his own concern.

Now, even in the case of a contract like that, what do we do? Take a contractor like that. He comes in with unclean hands. In my judgment, that officer ought to be court-martialed and sent out of the Army; and yet, with a contract like that, the desire of the committee was to do equal and exact justice to a contractor of that kind; and we provided here that the Secretary of War shall segregate even that kind of a contract and submit it to this commission; but if the commission finds, notwithstanding the circumstances under which the contract was obtained from the Government, that they have done something or furnished goods for which the Government ought to pay, the commission is allowed to pay for them. It could not be fairer.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no one could have any sympathy with that sort of contract; and I not only have no defense to make of a proceeding of that kind, but I should like very clearly to differentiate such contracts from the ordinary obligations which have been entered into.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator excuse me just a minute? If he will look into this bill, the Hitchcock bill, and the Chamberlain bill, too, that class of contracts is very clearly differentiated from the other classes, and it ought to be. My natural propensity, anyone's natural propensity, would be, in a case like that, to say, "You come in here with unclean hands. You can not recover anything from the Government"; but we do not do that. We put it in the power of this independent commission which we create to deal fairly even with that man, notwithstanding he comes in with unclean hands.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking of any such case. I am speaking of an honest contract; but section 6 provides:

> That in no case, however, shall any award either by the commission or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies received and actually delivered.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not read it all. Will not the Senator do the provision the justice to read it all?

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

> Beyond the goods and supplies received and actually delivered to the United States, and a remuneration for expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking, mark you, of an honest contract, made properly or validated properly under this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator a moment ago to say that in such a case he wanted to put the contractor and the Government in exactly the same position as though the contract had been made between two individuals, and allow a recovery from the Government of those damages which, under recognized principles of the law, would be recoverable. It was that thought which led me to make the inquiry. Now, I think the Government of the United States ought to be just as honest as an individual.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. It can not, of course, always be sued. It has some immunities in that respect; but whenever we find a contract that would be enforceable between private persons, I think the Government ought to pay just the same damage and upon the same rule which its courts would enforce against a private person who had violated his contract or who had failed to carry it out.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. CUMMINS. This section will not do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about it. If the Senator will simply read the Cramp case, in Two hundred and sixteenth United States, page 494, he will find that the Supreme Court has definitely held that the departments can not allow unliquidated damages.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking about the law. Let the law come as it will; it will be administered either by the commission or the Court of Claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we give the commission the right to consider prospective or possible profits our action is final. I want to leave it where the law is, and that is what this section does. It puts them exactly where the law leaves them and where the other settlements are left.

Mr. CUMMINS. You can not put them above the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. But we can prepare a law especially for them, and if the Senate strikes out section 6 and we adopt the provision of the House, there will be a special law in their favor in so far as possible or prospective profits are concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where is that found? I am asking purely for information. Where do we make a special law for the recovery of damages in such a case?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Secretary of War, under the terms of the bill, is given the power to allow such damages and profits as he may see fit upon the cancellation of the contract unless limited. When I say the Secretary of War, we known the Secretary of War does not do it, but some second lieutenant or major or captain. For instance, if it is enamel ware, this man McCubbin will allow it. He can allow the Standard Sanitary Co., where he comes from, whatever profit he sees fit.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking now of the case of a contract either originally made or validated in the way provided for in either the Hitchcock amendment or the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am speaking of that, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean to say that in such a case there is any special provision in either of these amendments with regard to the measure of damages?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but here is what we do. Without the restricting feature set out in section 6 of the amendment, these officers of the Army who make the settlements on valid contracts already validated or those that we validate will be permitted to make any settlement they please, and the Government will be bound by it. If they allow prospective and possible profits and unliquidated damages, it will be absolutely good under this provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Government then have the opportunity to appeal to a commission or the Court of Claims?

Mr. McKELLAR. They have a limited right of appeal in the Chamberlain bill. In the Hitchcock amendment, which is much better, the commission itself settles the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW].

Mr. FLETCHER. Just in connection with what the Senator from Iowa said——

Mr. McKELLAR. All right.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me to point it out, the Senator from Iowa, I think, is correct in that the bills do not cover profits. Section 5 of the Hitchcock bill reads:

> Jurisdiction to hear the case and render final judgment in such sum as may be required to reimburse the contractor for expenses necessarily incurred in good faith in the partial performance of the contract or order above referred to.

I do not think provision is made for profits in either of these measures. Therefore I can not see that there is any reason for negativing something that is not provided for elsewhere.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator makes the same mistake that other Senators have made. This section does not apply to profits at all; it applies only to prospective and possible profits, and there is a very wide distinction between the two classes of profits, as we all know.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the authority given elsewhere in the bill, there is nothing anywhere requiring the commission or the Secretary of War to allow profits. That is the point the Senator from Iowa makes. I also want to ask the Senator this question: He referred frequently in his remarks to the Hitchcock amendment. He has reference to the bill proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill that is about to be offered as a substitute?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator, if he has reference to that, whether section 6 of that amendment covers what is offered in the other bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it does, and what we are doing now is trying to perfect the Chamberlain amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator if he proposes to substitute the Hitchcock amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to have that measure adopted. I am very much in favor of the Hitchcock amendment. I think it is a very much juster measure than this. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry by stating a case. I know, for instance, one concern, a woodworking concern, which was called upon in the early stages of this contract making to depart from its own line of products and to take up an entirely new one for the department; that is, new, except that it was in the line of woodworking. They did not want to do it, because it involved a very radical change in their plant, the addition of a lot of machinery, and all that. They carried on their negotiations with the department verbally; there was not a stroke of the pen on any of it. They demurred against it, objected to it, but finally, at the insistence of the department, agreed that they would depart from their own line and go into this side line that the department wanted them to take on.

They never did reach the point of making a written contract, but they did this, Mr. President: They estimated what it would cost them to put in the new plant and what it would cost them to dismantle that new plant when they got through with the Government job, because when they do get through with that the additional machinery that they put in in order to turn it out is of no value to them whatever. They have to take it out, every single stitch and particle of it, and their agreement with the Government as to the price they were ultimately to receive was fixed on the profit that they expected to make out of the Government contract.

Now, only a part of their goods have been delivered. They have a very large quantity of undelivered stuff in a partial stage of completion only left on their hands, and they owe something like $600,000 in the banks which they have borrowed in order to complete that contract. That is four times as much as ordinarily they would be able to borrow from the banks according to their capital and all. The banks can not go any further with them. They can not dismantle and go back to their own line. They are tied up without being able to settle this contract at all. They are at a standstill. Their employees are idle. In other words, they are out of business.

Now, I want to know if the Senator thinks under the amendment he has just offered, if it prevails, it would be possible for the War Department to make an adjustment with them, allowing what they expected to get on the face of which they went into the contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer the Senator's question. If this amendment should prevail, that concern would get a return for all the money expended, a reasonable profit on what has been done. The Secretary of War or the commission would be in position to give that concern everything, including a real profit that the concern was justly entitled to. But if the concern, with that verbal understanding stated, just as the Senator has stated, which seems to me to be quite vague, turns up and says, "Now, we have spent $75,000 and we expected to make a million dollars out of it," it would not permit those possible or prospective profits of a million dollars on a $75,000 investment. This section would prevent that, but the section would provide that what was right and proper and reasonable should be paid the contractor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, let me take just one moment to state a case that actually came up. I do not know whether the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] was on the subcommittee or not. I am talking from the record now. I am not talking of hearsay or possible hearsay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment I will yield. One division of the Army here last September gave verbal orders for 25,000 bathtubs for the Army. I believe in bathtubs and I believe in taking baths, but it looks to me like 25,000 enamel-ware bathtubs for the Army was a pretty good order. This Mr. Ahrens, the president of the Standard Sanitary Co., in Pittsburgh, who had his agents down here buying bathtubs from him for the Government, went to the Bathtub Manufacturers' Association meeting and bragged about it. They were the people who did not get any contracts. Mr. McCubbin had cribbed all the contracts for the Standard Co., and they had not gotten these contracts and they came down here and told us about it. Mr. McCubbin denied that he had given the contract for 25,000 bathtubs. It appeared that there was no doubt about it. He had just as good a contract as the one referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]; but when he found out the monstrous proposition there was in the purchase of 25,000 bathtubs, enamel ware, zinc, and closets, and everything of that sort, what happened? Where they are going to put them in the Army it is difficult to find. I do not know where so many could have been used. But here was a great company. It had bathtubs to sell; it had its agents buying them for the Government; it had its agents selling them to the Government. Gentlemen, that is the proof. Look in part 2 of the hearings and you will find the proof of this very thing that I say. Now, had we not better put just a little hold on these boys who are settling up with themselves?

Mr. CUMMINS. Those contracts ought not to be validated at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly it ought not to be validated so as to get what the president of this company may consider is a prospective or possible profit out of it.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield to the Senator from New Jersey, and then I will yield to the Senator from New York. Indeed, I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will say to the Senator from New York that I shall take only a moment. The Senator from Tennessee has clearly stated his definition of the amendment in regard to certain cases that have come under his observation which clearly are contracts that should never have been made. I have very little knowledge of contract law. The Senator, who is a lawyer, knows a great deal more about it than I do. As I stated before, I am very anxious to avoid any injustice by inserting in the act any phraseology which will repudiate any honest contract made by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have the same view the Senator has.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Now, I will put a concrete case, and I would very much like to have the Senator's opinion as to whether his amendment will not practically repudiate this agreement made by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to give the Senator any information I can.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A by-product coke manufacturing concern was solicited by the War Department to add to its plant additional ovens in order to increase for the Government the supply of toluol and ammonia.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am familiar with that class of contracts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The business of the company in normal times did not need the additional equipment, and it was unwilling to expend the money required for this addition unless it was secured by a contract for the sale of these products, which were merely by-products in its coke production. The War Department therefore made a contract with the concern whereby the concern obligated itself to build additional ovens and sell its entire output of toluol and ammonia to the Government for the period of two years.

The contracts contained a provision authorizing the War Department to cancel the contract at any time, in which event it agreed to pay the producer for the balance of the term of the contract the difference between the contract price and the amount which the producer would realize on the market for such product. The manufacturers decided that if they had a sale of these products for two years at the contract price, which was the standard price paid by the Government, they could take the business risk of having a larger plant than they needed at the termination of the war.

Now, that was a two years' contract. It is canceled, and your provision provides that no unearned profits shall be paid——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken about that. That contract, if I caught it right, and I think I did, would be perfectly plain. It provides what profits shall be made. They are fixed in the contract. Of course those profits will be allowed under the settlement. Under section 6 there is no doubt in the world about that. Why? Because the parties, before the contract was made, agreed upon what the profits should be, and they are not prospective or possible profits; they are excluded by the terms of the contract from prospective or possible profit.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They are prospective profits.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. Prospective profits are not profits that the parties have agreed to beforehand and fixed themselves. Of course not.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean to say if there is a contract where they propose to pay a profit of 10 per cent on a billion dollars' worth of goods and only $1,000,000 worth is accepted, yet that is liquidated damages?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, no; I mean this: As I understood the reading of the contract by the Senator from New Jersey, it was that the profits which should accrue were fixed by the parties themselves in the making of the contract, and if it is liquidated damages it is not prospective or possible profits at all, and it comes directly within this provision.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will take only a moment more. I have another case, and possibly the Senator from Tennessee can tell me whether it will come under section 6.

Mr. McKELLAR. You know what they say about a lawyer who gives an offhand opinion; it is not very good. But I will be delighted to give such an opinion as I can.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very glad the Senator has made that reservation. Possibly when he reads the RECORD he will want to correct it a little.

In a number of instances the Government has required the manufacturers of articles, which were covered by patent which were not owned by them, to make such articles. In such instances there was not time to stop and have careful inquiry as to whether an infringement was involved, and the Government has inserted in its contract a clause agreeing to protect the manufacturer from any claims of the owner of the patent. Would your amendment affect in any way those agreements?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer the Senator's question by asking another. Was the acquirement of those patents necessarily incurred in order to carry out the contract?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that this is the situation as it occurred in many cases where is was necessary for the Government to procure war equipment. The questions of infringement of patent rights or royalty and other questions were simply postponed for future settlement, and in the emergency the Secretary of War assured the owners of the rights and the patents that a settlement would be hereafter made and adjusted.

Mr. McKELLAR. The patents were necessary in order to carry out the contracts, were they not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Absolutely.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then it comes directly within the very terms of section 6. It is not left to doubt or to construction, but it comes direcly within the terms of section 6.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I make the same reservation about curbstone opinions that I made to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CALDER. I am not a lawyer, as is the Senator from Tennessee, who is a distinguished lawyer, and there is every indication that he has given much thought to this particular provision. I am disposed to agree with the Senator in many of the provisions of the so-called Hitchcock amendment, but the talk on both sides of the Chamber indicates that there is some doubt in the minds of some as to just what section 6 means. I agree substantially with what the Senator says it means, and I wonder if he will be willing to insert this language in the section——

Mr. McKELLAR. There have been some insertions already made, but let the Senator state it.

Mr. CALDER. After the words "United States," in line 10, insert "or ready for delivery or in process of manufacture."

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think that that would be a proper amendment; I have no objection to it. If the Senator will offer it, I will accept it.

Mr. CALDER. I offer that as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee accept the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I make one suggestion to the Senator from Tennessee? I think he misapprehends that section. The section does not protect the contractor against liability which he incurred; absolutely not. In the case put by the Senator from New Jersey, where the contractor is indemnified by the Government for the use of patents that are held by other parties, every man who uses the patent violates the law, and the royalty may be recovered. Here is an institution going ahead under the guaranty of the Government and using the patents of other individuals, or it may be hundreds of them, as far as that is concerned. All these individuals will have recourse to that contractor, who has acted in reliance upon his guaranty. There is nothing in section 6 to protect those men against those liabilities.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not possibly agree with the Senator, because it provides in specific terms remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred. If they have incurred these expenditures, even though they have done so in violation of patent rights, they come directly within the wording of the section just the same. I yield the floor now.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer an amendment to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as modified, insert the following:

That in no case shall any award, either by the Secretary of War, the commission, or the Court of Claims, include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and a remuneration which may include a reasonable profit for expenditures and obligations or liabilities necessarily incurred in performing or preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Thank you.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw my amendment and accept this one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his amendment to the amendment and accepts the one just offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question? Is the language broad enough to include remuneration for profits upon goods which might be in whole or in part manufactured, but which had not been delivered?

Mr. LENROOT. The language is "in performing or preparing to perform," which clearly would include that.

Mr. POMERENE. I so understand it, but I wanted to be certain about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not clear to me as to the last clause of the proposed amendment. As I caught it, it says the remuneration shall include a reasonable profit.

Mr. LENROOT. Which may include.

Mr. FLETCHER. Which may include a reasonable profit for expenditures.

Mr. LENROOT. Or obligations or liabilities.

Mr. FLETCHER. A "reasonable profit" is one thing and "expenditures necessarily incurred" quite another thing. You do not mean a profit on expenditures?

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is correct, and that should be changed.

Mr. FLETCHER. "Reasonable profits and expenditures."

Mr. LENROOT. No; the language is that the award may permit a remuneration which may include a reasonable profit for expenditures and obligations, and so forth. I think that is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Reasonable profits on the performance of the contract is one thing, but remuneration for expenditures, it seems to me, is a different thing. I should think what the Senator perhaps has in mind is to provide for a reasonable profit, and, in addition to that, remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred.

Mr. LENROOT. I am permitting that. That is what I intend to do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the word "and" should be inserted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator has it exactly right. The difference between the amendment he has offered and the one offered by me is that his specifically provides for reasonable profits on what the contractor has done. The amendment offered by me provides for precisely the same thing. Both amendments exclude possible or prospective profits. That is my understanding of it, and I think it is entirely satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me it would be perfectly absurd to provide for reasonable profits and to have a profit for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing for the contract.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is remuneration for expenditures, which remuneration may include a reasonable profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would not object to that, but a "reasonable profit for expenditures" is a thing that I can not comprehend.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator does not read it correctly. It is remuneration for expenditures—that is the grammatical construction—which may include a reasonable profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can understand that; but what I can not quite comprehend is the expression "remuneration * * * for expenditures * * * necessarily incurred" or remuneration for profits on expenditures.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to explain how the term "remuneration" can include a profit. Remuneration means to make good to a man what he has expended. It is therefore less than profit. How can the lesser include the greater?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not understand that remuneration for expenditures necessarily is limited to the actual amount of the expenditures. Remuneration and compensation, I think, are synonymous terms in this, that compensation for expenditures might include the actual amount of expenditures and something added to it for profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree with the Senator, but I think the language is a little unfortunate in that it seems to provide for remuneration for profits on expenditures.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me read it as it stands, and then if the Senator thinks so I shall be glad to accept an amendment to it to make it clear:

And a remuneration, which may include a reasonable profit, for expenditures.

That is, remuneration for expenditures, which remuneration may include a reasonable profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. It might depend upon the punctuation. Do you put a comma after "remuneration"?

Mr. LENROOT. I have a comma after "remuneration" and one after "profit."

Mr. McKELLAR. That will cover it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon accepts the amendment to the amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer to the substitute the following, to be added to section 4——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment to the amendment has not been voted on by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has not been voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs pardon. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment was not a substitute, because it left the proviso in which had theretofore been accepted by the Senator; so that the amendment as adopted includes the proviso. I merely desire to understand whether that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state the question properly. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has presented an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me, Mr. President, but I am not entirely satisfied with what the RECORD will show in reference to this matter. There seems to be a little pride of opinion in relation to this amendment. The amendment which the Senator from Tennessee proposed was not accepted at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the fact that the Senator from Tennessee offered an amendment; then the Senator from Wisconsin offered an amendment to it, and the Senator from Tennessee said that he accepted that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So that the amendment becomes the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which was adopted. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has offered an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 4, on page 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

In all proceedings hereunder witnesses may be compelled to attend, appear, and testify, and produce books, papers, and letters or other documents, and the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving the same shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask whether the Senator is offering that amendment to the committee substitute or to my substitute?

Mr. POMERENE. I am offering it to the committee substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be designated as section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. Whenever, under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War shall make an award to any prime contractor who shall have sublet any part of said contract for material, equipment, or supplies to any other person, firm, or corporation who has in good faith made expenditures, incurred obligations, rendered service, or furnished material, equipment, or supplies to any prime contractor, with the knowledge and approval of any agent of the Secretary of War duly authorized thereunto, the Secretary of War shall apportion the amount of said award justly due to each of the subcontractors of said prime contractors. Before payment of said award the Secretary of War shall require any prime contractor to present satisfactory evidence of having paid said subcontractors or of the consent of said subcontractors to look for their compensation to said prime contractor only; and in the case of the failure of said prime contractor to present such evidence or such consent, the Secretary of War shall pay directly to said subcontractors the amount found to be due under said award; and in case of the insolvency of any prime contractor the subcontractor of said prime contractor shall have a lien upon the funds arising from said award prior and superior to the lien of any general creditors of said prime contractor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the amendment, but I believe that under the terms of the bill reported by the committee the amendment of the Senator is covered. I shall not, however, make any objection to it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have had serious doubts of that. I may say that this matter has been studied by some constituents of mine who are especially interested in it, and I am disposed to take their view of it. I do not believe that the interests of subcontractors are protected by this proposed legislation as they ought to be. I have not any private opinion about this matter, and I shall be very glad, if the amendment shall be adopted, to let the conferees work it out as they think it ought to be.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to move to strike out the proviso, beginning in line 14, page 5, to the end of the paragraph, including line 17, and to insert instead of it another proviso, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

I think the present proviso in the bill as submitted makes it a rather one-sided sort of proposition, and I think that which I propose would clear up the whole matter. I believe it will be agreeable to the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee if they will listen to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 14, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and to insert the following:

That payment of expense incurred or loss and damage suffered in preparing for or in the performance of such informal agreements or of formal contracts shall not exceed the fair value of labor performed or services rendered or the actual cost of the materials used, as determined by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree to that amendment. That means, Mr. President, that whatever agency in the entire country, or even abroad, which happens to be representing the War Department, can fix any compensation they desire. It would not be fair to the Government; it would be very unwise and unjust. The committee has provided a plan here which does equal and exact justice. I think, if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, we might just as well simply turn this matter over and say to the Secretary of War, "You may employ any agency you choose and settle it in any way you can." That is really the meaning and effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. It gives the Secretary carte blanche to settle these contracts in any way he wishes, and I hope the Senator will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not change the provision of the bill at all as to the powers of the Secretary of War or of the commission or anything else.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. The words "as determined by the Secretary of War" are absolutely the important language in the proposed proviso.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing to strike out those words if that is the objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida propose to strike out any portion of his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from Florida is willing to strike out the clause which he has indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Florida please state what portion of the amendment he desires to strike out in order that the Secretary may understand it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I propose to strike out the words "as determined by the Secretary of War," and to let the amendment end with the word "used."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I simply wish to say to the Senate that this amendment practically nullifies the amendment which we have just adopted, as offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. So I hope the Senators are aware of the effect of the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment not only nullifies or neutralizes the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, but it is inconsistent with the spirit of the provision as reported by the committee, and is so repugnant to the whole idea that is sought to be expressed that it ought not to be approved at all.

Senators will observe that the provision of the committee amendment is that there shall be awarded such relief "as will under all the circumstances fairly and equitably compensate him or it for the expenditures made, obligations incurred, equipment, materials, or supplies furnished or acquired, or services rendered, as aforesaid." That is the rule laid down by the committee for the ascertainment of losses. Then the committee qualifies that rule by the proviso:

Provided, That in no event shall such contract provide for compensation on terms more favorable than the terms, if any, for which the aforesaid agreement, order, or request may have provided.

That is understandable; it is a real limitation or qualification upon the rule laid down by the committee; but, if this amendment is adopted, we shall find ourselves in the rather unfortunate attitude of having laid down one rule and immediately afterwards having prescribed another—a most unsatisfactory ending, I should think, for a very happy expression of the rule as the committee has reported it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am in accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I hope the amendment will not be adopted. It is a great pleasure to me at this time to have, for once, the Senator from Tennessee in accord with me. It proves that he is sometimes right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very frequently in accord with the distinguished Senator from Oregon, whom I love very dearly, and when I am not in accord with him I regret exceedingly that he is wrong.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would simply indicate that if both of those Senators are in accord I must be wrong, and I ask to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have an amendment on the desk to the bill, to be known now as section 6, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. LENROOT. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, as I understand he has a new paragraph to offer.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin applies to the text itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "or aid in procuring the same."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may understand the purpose of this amendment, I will say that unless the amendment is adopted the bill is going to open the door to a veritable flood of claims not contemplated at this time at all. Under the language reported by the committee, if any department of the Government, if any dollar-a-year man on the War Industries Board, has made a request that somebody should do something with reference to the preparation of a contract or to do anything to aid the Government in securing munitions, although there is not a semblance of authority to make a contract, nevertheless the Government under the language of the bill is bound.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee thought that the idea which the Senator now has in mind was fully provided for in lines 4, 5, and 6, where the bill reads:

Has made an agreement with the Secretary of War, or with any officer or agent acting under his authority, or with any agency of the Government authorized to procure or aid in procuring—

Mr. LENROOT. "Or aid in procuring."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. It is only those contracts which are authorized to be made that are covered. We thought that was adequate protection.

Mr. LENROOT. It must be remembered, however, that all of these contracts were authorized to aid in the procuring of supplies. It is not so important, so far as the first paragraph is concerned, but the Senator will recall that with reference to the subsequent paragraphs of the bill, where the claim is founded upon a mere request, it may be founded upon the kind of an agency I have suggested.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 6, after the word "procure," it is proposed to strike out "or aid in procuring the same," so as to read:

Or with any agency of the Government authorized to procure for the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 17, after the word "requirements," it is proposed to insert "or compliance has been waived as herein provided."

Mr. LENROOT. That is to cover the objection made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on yesterday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. I will merely state the purpose of it. The bill as it now stands does not provide for an appeal to the commission in the case of contracts where compliance has been waived. This will permit such an appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "any dispute arises" and to insert "the Secretary of War and the contractor shall fail to agree."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the contention has been made that the language of the bill would permit an appeal before the contractor and the Secretary of War had come to a disagreement. I doubt very much whether that is a proper construction; but I take it there will be no objection to making it clear that the appeal can only be had after a failure to agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have one more amendment to offer. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of line 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That such waiver shall not validate such contract or procurement order in so far as any claim for unearned profits may be involved.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this is the matter that was discussed yesterday as to making valid a contract that had not been validly executed, and there was some little discussion here as to whether the validation of such a contract would not give the contractor a valid, legal claim to all unearned profits. I offer this amendment, which is in harmony with the one which has already been adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 3, after the word "form," it is proposed to insert the words "or when the Secretary of War has not waived such noncompliance."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment is intended to give the Secretary of War, and afterwards the commission, the opportunity to do justice in those cases in which a compliance has been waived.

Mr. McKELLAR. On what page and line, may I ask the Senator, does the amendment come in? My attention was temporarily diverted.

Mr. CUMMINS. On page 5, line 3, after the word "form." It is akin to an amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and is necessary to complete it. In other words, it brings into paragraph 2 the cases in which compliance with strict statutory forms has been waived by the Secretary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator allow me just another suggestion, and then I will not interfere again, I hope. I have another amendment, but unfortunately have mislaid it for the moment and can not put my hands upon it, but I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, as well as the Senator from Tennessee, who is interested in another form of bill, a question. Suppose the Secretary of War, under the first paragraph of the committee amendment, declines to waive the failure to comply with the statutory requirements or form and the contract is therefore invalid, strictly considered. I want to provide jurisdiction on the part of the commission to review the action of the Secretary of War in that respect exactly as it is provided that the commission may review the action of the Secretary of War in every other respect which affects the rights of the contractors. Would the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Tennessee have objection to such a provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to it. I think a better plan, however, would be for the Senator to vote for the Hitchcock amendment, which will put it beyond question; but, of course, that is a matter for him to determine. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, may I ask why there should be any such provision now that the bill has been amended giving the contractors the benefit of the other provisions of the bill which do absolutely guarantee them a reasonable compensation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is a difference between the remedy given under the second paragraph of the bill and the remedy that might be given under the first paragraph; and it seems to me that, if the commission is to stand in review of the act of the Secretary of War, it ought to have the power to review his act in refusing to validate a contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think clearly, under the Chamberlain bill, that if the Secretary of War should refuse, then the contractor could appeal to the commission. If that is not the construction to be placed upon the bill, I will be very glad to vote for an amendment which will effectuate that object, because the contractors ought to have that right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there could be an appeal prosecuted upon that ground.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will offer such an amendment, so far as I am concerned, I will be glad to have it made a part of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now have the amendment which I had in mind and will send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On line 21, on page 7, it is proposed to strike out the word "Thereupon," and insert the following:

If the Secretary of War shall refuse to waive noncompliance with statutory requirements in respect to any agreement within the purview of the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, or upon the expiration of 60 days from the date of the taking effect of this act shall have failed to waive such noncompliance, the contractor named in any such agreement may, within 30 days after such refusal or after the expiration of such 60 days, file with the chairman of said commission a notice of appeal in all cases where an appeal is taken hereunder.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before the amendment is acted on, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. I should like to ask him if he has considered how that amendment affects the language of the remainder of the section? Do I understand that it is to be inserted before the word "Thereupon"?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is inserted in lieu of the word "Thereupon."

Mr. LENROOT. I ask to have the amendment again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The amendment was again stated.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the amendment is all right, Mr. President. It takes away from the Secretary of War the arbitrary power to refuse a waiver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think all sides to this contract controversy have ignored the House bill, which was sent over here to us to be considered. A careful perusal of that bill shows that it contains some very good provisions, and one especially that ought to go in this bill. I am going to offer an amendment, which I will read, because, in the form in which it is found, I believe I can read it better. After the word "thereof," in line 12, on page 12, I move to insert the following:

And provided further, That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement shall bar the United States Government through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into, or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns, or any party or parties.

Mr. President, of course, that applies only to a settlement which is made in fraud of the Government, and I take it that there will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Where does the Senator take it from the House bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will look at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3, he will see the words "That no" right at the bottom. I desire to have it come in as a new section immediately after the Pomerene amendment that was adopted. I had forgotten that the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment which was adopted a while ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is to be inserted after the last word of that paragraph as it is amended now?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, just one moment. I believe that it would improve the amendment if the Senator would amend it just a little, by striking out the words "any such agreement" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any contract covered by the terms of this bill."

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment goes a little further than that, I believe.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment that the Senator has proposed reads as follows——

Mr. McKELLAR. It is identically the House provision on that subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. [Reading:]

That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement—

What agreement? I want it to read "any contract provided for in this bill."

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Strike out the words "such agreement."

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept that amendment; and I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may add the second proviso as well:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statutes of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator incorporates that in his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the Senator from Oregon will please state his amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want it to read in this way:

No settlement of any claim arising under the provisions of this bill shall bar the United States—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee accept that amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to know where it goes in.

Mr. McKELLAR. Immediately after the Pomerene amendment. Oh, the Senator means the Chamberlain amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. That goes in at the top of page 3, in lieu of the words "such agreement." He inserts there "the contracts provided for in this act," which I think is very proper, on page 3 of the Chamberlain bill. It goes in as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment heretofore agreed to, offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

That no settlement of any claim arising under the provisions of this bill shall bar the United States——

Mr. McKELLAR. It ought to be "this act."

The SECRETARY (reading)—

That no settlement of any claim arising under the provisions of this act shall bar the United States Government, through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into, or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns, or any party or parties: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statutes of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator whether this portion of his proposed amendment will not delay the payment by the Government to these contractors and others?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why no. Why should it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to ask the Senator now and call his attention to the language. Take the language of the House bill, if you please—"from the right of review of such settlement." Suppose a claim has been adjusted and liquidated under the provisions of this bill; will it not still be open to a review before the payment has been made?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; this applies only in cases of fraud. By the way, the third proviso should be added to this. I am going to ask unanimous consent in a moment that it shall be added. This section applies only to cases of fraud. Where a settlement under a contract has been procured by fraud the Government is not precluded by such settlement if it is fraudulently made.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There may be some doubt about the language.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is only about fraud; and, if there is any doubt, the Senator can fix it in conference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We can probably adjust it in conference if there is that doubt.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert also the third proviso:

And provided further, That this act shall in no way relieve or excuse any officer or his agent from such criminal prosecution because of any irregularity or illegality in the manner of the execution of such agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not need unanimous consent for that. The amendment has not yet been adopted. It is the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move, then, that that be added to the amendment. I perfect the amendment by adding that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 23, after the word "thereon," it is proposed to insert the words "according to the justice and equity thereof," so that if amended it will read:

And make its award or finding thereon according to the justice and equity thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I offer as a new section the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to ascertain and determine the amount or amounts of money heretofore invested or contracted to be invested and obligations incurred by any and all persons and investors for producing or for the purpose of producing or preparing for producing or acquiring property for producing, within the United States, to supply the urgent, published, and evident needs of the Nation during the war, any ores, metals, minerals, or mineral substances mentioned and enumerated in an act of Congress approved October 5, 1918 (public, No. 220), entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply;" the production of which was requested or demanded by the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, the Department of the Interior, or other agency of the Government.

And that said Secretary ascertain, determine, adjust, liquidate, and out of the moneys provided and appropriated by said act pay to the parties entitled thereto the amount of such losses and damages as he, the said Secretary, shall find and determine have been sustained and suffered or are likely to be sustained and suffered by reason of having made such investments for said purposes or having produced surplus stocks of such materials; and that in each case he shall make such determination, provision, settlement, advancement, or final payment, and by agreement with owners and claimants make such other adjustment or take such other action as he shall find and determine to be just, equitable, reasonable, and expedient; and that he make such provisions as he may deem necessary, advisable, and reasonable to prevent further losses pending final decision, settlement, and disposition in any case or cases; that the payments herein authorized be made to the claimant or claimants the said Secretary shall find to be morally, equitably, and justly entitled thereto; that in ascertaining and determining the losses and damages sustained or to be sustained, and the adjustments, settlements, payments, and provisions to be made the said Secretary shall consider the prices and conditions existing at the time of each investment and the prices and conditions existing prior to the war, as well as those existing at the time of such determination, adjustment, and settlement, together with all of the circumstances and conditions of each case; that the final determination, decision, provision, disposition, and action of said Secretary in each case shall be conclusive and final; that all payments shall be made and all expenses incurred by the Secretary paid from the funds and appropriations provided and appropriated by said act of October 5, 1918 (public, No. 220), and that said funds and appropriations shall continue to be available for said purposes until such time as the said Secretary shall have fully exercised the authority hereby granted and performed and completed the duties hereby provided and imposed: Provided, however, That said Secretary shall consider, approve, and dispose of only such claims as shall be made hereunder and filed with the Department of the Interior within three months from and after the approval of this act.

That a report of all operations under this section, including receipts and disbursements, shall be made to Congress on or before the first Monday in December of each year.

That nothing in this section shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that this amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Interior—

To ascertain and determine the amount or amounts of money heretofore invested or contracted to be invested and obligations incurred by any and all persons and investors for producing or for the purpose of producing or preparing for producing or acquiring property for producing, within the United States, to supply the urgent, published, and evident needs of the Nation—

And so forth. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the words "or acquiring property for producing." It seems to me that is going too far. I think that where a man has purchased a piece of property for producing these metals we should not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to go into the question as to what he paid and whether he lost upon the purchase price of that property because of the fact that the war closed sooner than he anticipated. I believe that is going altogether too far. I will ask the Senator if it would not be very much better to strike out the words "or acquiring property for producing"?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will consent to that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer that amendment to the amendment, on lines 6 and 7, of page 1, of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, could not this amendment be printed and go over until to-morrow? Some of us have not had a chance to read it. It is a very long and very important amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment has already been printed.

Mr. CURTIS. Some of us have had no opportunity to read it; and, as I understood, the Senator this afternoon offered some additional amendments to the one that he offered yesterday. We have had no chance at all to read his perfected amendment offered this afternoon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have tried to impress on the Members of the Senate the very great importance of the enactment of this measure, or some measure, for the relief of those that have been dealing innocently and patriotically with the Government of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to state to the Senator that I have no desire to delay action on the bill reported by him. I think there should be early action upon it; but I do object to passing upon an amendment offered here in the afternoon which none of us have had a chance to read, and which, it seems to me, goes very, very far indeed, and is liable to constitute a very bad precedent on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator will yield just a moment, I wish to state that this amendment was proposed by me and printed on January 20 and is on the desks of all of the Senators.

Mr. CURTIS. But the Senator offered amendments to it this afternoon.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; it is absolutely in the form in which it was presented, with the exception of striking out two words.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator stood upon the floor this afternoon and announced that he wanted to perfect his amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. That was in order to introduce the same amendment that was printed on the 20th of November to the Chamberlain bill and the Hitchcock bill, so as to perfect them, to be sure that it would be considered under whichever bill passed the Senate. However, I have no objection to the amendment going over, so as to explain it to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Some of us have been very busy with committee meetings; and, as far as I am concerned, I have not had time to read the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to the amendment going over until to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. If the members of the committee have read the amendment and are able to state to us what it contains, and what its effect will be, I am perfectly ready to vote upon it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that in view of the feeling of some of the Senators about the matter, I am going at the proper time to move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator makes that motion I ask for a reprint of the bill showing the committee amendment in italics and the amendments adopted thereto in the Committee of the Whole printed in small capitals. I ask that the bill be reprinted and ready for the use of the Senate to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I join in that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, without objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before any action is taken may I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he would be willing, on page 2, line 12 of his proposed substitute, in case that should be adopted, to change the word "signed" to the word "acted," so that it would read:

Not legally qualified or authorized to give a formal legal contract, except where such officer has acted as the representative of a superior officer—

Instead of "signed"?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday I asked to have inserted in the RECORD certain testimony taken from the evidence of Mr. Charles A. Rice. Only a portion of that testimony was inserted; and I ask unanimous consent to have the remainder of it inserted now as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator only wishes to have the additional testimony inserted?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all; just the additional testimony.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DYEING INDUSTRY.

The statement of Mr. Charles A. Rice is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. CHARLES A. RICE.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Rice, what position do you occupy with the Government?

Mr. RICE. I am chief of the cotton converting section of the cotton goods branch in the Quartermaster General's Office.

Senator McKELLAR. How long have you been there?

Mr. RICE. I came to Washington the latter part of February and started in the very last of February.

Senator McKELLAR. Started in this present section?

Mr. RICE. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Had you been connected with the Government before in any way?

Mr. RICE. Not at all.

Senator McKELLAR. What was your firm in New York?

Mr. RICE. The firm of Myrick & Rice.

Senator McKELLAR. Are you connected in any way with that firm now?

Mr. RICE. Not at all, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. Do you own any stock in it?

Mr. RICE. No, sir; none whatever. In fact, it was a partnership—it was not a stock company—acting as agents.

Senator McKELLAR. And you have disposed of all agency you had with the firm?

Mr. RICE. I have.

Senator McKELLAR. Do you expect to go into it after the war?

Mr. RICE. I can not say as to that. I mean, I have not any agreement to; none whatever with Mr. Myrick. In fact, that all depends. I can not say what I would do or will do after that—after the war is over.

Senator McKELLAR. Have you done any business with that firm since you have been in the employ of the Government?

Mr. RICE. I am doing business with concerns that they represent.

Senator McKELLAR. With concerns that they represent. To what extent are you doing business with firms that they represent?

Mr. RICE. Only to the extent that I consider that they are equipped to handle certain lines of work that have been needed; that is, along the lines of sulphur dyeing.

Senator McKELLAR. Will you explain your method of contracting in the sulphur-dyeing industry?

Mr. RICE. My personal plan when I took hold of it was to get a statement as to the equipment of all the finishers, and knowing what the equipment should be from the practical point of view I lined up the contractors all over the country as to their equipment, as to wide machinery and narrow machinery and what character of machinery they had for dyeing of light and heavy goods, and then later I made a personal investigation, a personal inspection of these plants in connection with the inspectors, the chief inspectors of the depot quartermaster; and then I sent out lists asking quotations from all contractors whom I considered capable of handling this business, and apportioned out the material to the lowest bidders, considering, of course, their equipment and their organization, as to their being capable of handling this material, and apportioned out the business.

Senator McKELLAR. Was it done on the competitive basis?

Mr. RICE. It is not; always.

Senator McKELLAR. What methods do you pursue? Do you let it to the lowest bidder?

Mr. RICE. I do, provided I consider they are equipped properly and understand the handling of this particular kind of work.

Senator McKELLAR. Can the dye operators of the country do all the Government work without any trouble?

Mr. RICE. Without any additional equipment.

Senator McKELLAR. Is there sufficient now to do it?

Mr. RICE. I so consider. In fact, it has been so, and I believe it is so.

Senator McKELLAR. Why would not the cheaper plan for the Government be to ask for sealed bids and give it to the lowest bidder who was responsible?

Mr. RICE. Of course. I do not know that I am correct on this, but my position is that I believe the dyeing and finishing business is somewhat different from advertising for a supply of boots and shoes, or even cotton goods. I know that the dyeing and finishing business especially, under present conditions and in such conditions as we have had during this war, is a business that has got to be very carefully handled; you have to consider the personnel and the equipment, as to whether these firms are able to handle bleaching or dyeing—on account of varying cotton materials and chemicals and dyestuffs and the various manufactures of chemicals and

* * * * * * *

Senator McKELLAR. But, at the same time, Mr. Rice, the manufacturing concerns and the houses that you formerly represented as sales agent and broker are receiving many contracts under you.

Mr. RICE. No; but a very small amount.

Senator McKELLAR. And the same thing is true of Mr. Bailey. I am talking to you in all frankness. Complaints have come in that you both came down here, as I believe, as dollar-a-year men, and that you were connected with these firms.

Mr. BAILEY. I did; Mr. Rice did also.

Senator McKELLAR. Maybe not. Maybe he came in after any necessity for the dollar-a-year men in the Quartermaster Department.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I think so.

Senator McKELLAR. But, anyway, it is claimed by your competitors, or men who have been your competitors, that by reason of your position you say which contractors shall get and which contractors shall not get a particular job. Just take the particular illustration that Mr. Rice made a while ago. He asked for quotations on the dyeing of khaki cloth, and numerous bids were made at 4 cents, and the Sayles Co., I believe, put in a quotation of 4.75 cents; and Mr. Rice, after going over it, said that he would give it to Mr. Sayles, but he must put it at the 4 cents. Now, you can easily understand how every bidder who bid 4 cents feels that Mr. Rice ought never to have done that; that they were the cause of the Government getting it at 4 cents; and they ought to have had it at 4 cents.

Mr. DONALD. They had all they could handle without it.

Mr. RICE. They had all they wanted first.

Senator McKELLAR. They do not feel so. They would not have put those figures in if they had not felt that they could do it, and they feel that they are just as competent to know what they can do as you gentleman here in Washington; and they do not feel as if they had had a square deal about it; and one of them said to me that at the very time you gave this contract to the Sayles Co., the Sayles Co. was filled up, and really was delayed in the getting out of these goods, whereas they were open and able to deliver to the Government quicker.

Mr. RICE. No.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, those are the practical questions that confront you gentlemen here this morning. We want to be absolutely fair, now, and we want to protect the Government and we want to be fair to everybody alike. My opinion is that a system ought to be instituted that will be fair, and such that no man can say that the Government's agents are not treating him fairly. Now, we must make it so that no man can say that, and that is what the Navy has done. We ought to follow the Navy's lead in the proposition.

Mr. RICE. I think you will always have that, Senator.

Senator McKELLAR. Who is the Southbridge Printing Co.?

Mr. RICE. A concern at Southbridge, Mass. They have been in sulphur dyeing for the last two years or more.

Senator McKELLAR. Who owns it?

Mr. RICE. Mr. Schuster, Mr. Heyward, Mr. Saunders—James A. Saunders—R. A. Rice, and Mr. Myrick. Mr. Hartley had some stock in there.

Senator McKELLAR. Who is Mr. R. A. Rice?

Mr. RICE. He is a brother of mine.

Senator McKELLAR. He is still interested in it?

Mr. RICE. Yes; he is still interested in it.

Senator McKELLAR. What amount of stock does he own?

Mr. RICE. It is my recollection, something like 75 shares. I would not state exactly. Of course, that is of record.

Senator McKELLAR. What interest did you have in the business before you came down here?

Mr. RICE. I had about a little over one-quarter of the stock.

Senator McKELLAR. How much is it capitalized at?

Mr. RICE. $135,000.

Senator McKELLAR. How much, in contracts, has that concern got?

Mr. RICE. I believe about, all told, during the year—of course I can give you an exact account of it.

Senator McKELLAR. I would be glad to have it.

Mr. RICE. About 3,000,000 yards.

Senator McKELLAR. 3,000,000 yards?

Mr. RICE. The recent contract, the gas-defense contract, they are doing some of the parafining for the gas defense.

Senator McKELLAR. What did you do with your stock? To whom did you sell it?

Mr. RICE. To my wife. The Quartermaster's Department stated that should be done, and I transferred it to my wife.

Senator McKELLAR. You did not sell it to her, did you?

Mr. RICE. I just transferred it over for $2.

Senator McKELLAR. You just put it in her name, so you would not be interested in it?

Mr. RICE. Yes; I transferred it over to her. In other words, it belongs to her.

Senator McKELLAR. Is there any other company you are connected with which you transferred to your wife the stock in?

Mr. RICE. Yes; I had some stock of the Fiskdale Finishing Co.

Senator McKELLAR. What is the capital of that company?

Mr. RICE. The capital is $200,000 preferred and $300,000 common.

Senator McKELLAR. And what was your interest in that?

Mr. RICE. My recollection is that it was a little over a quarter interest.

Senator McKELLAR. And you transferred that to your wife?

Mr. RICE. That was in the common stock of that company; and I had, I think, about $15,000, if I recall, of preferred stock. I turned that over to my wife.

Senator McKELLAR. Have you done any business with that company?

Mr. RICE. Yes, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. How much have you allotted to them?

Mr. RICE. I should say about 3,000,000 yards during the year.

Senator McKELLAR. Have those contracts been filled?

Mr. RICE. Not all of them. They are working on them now. In fact, some of the material has been delivered to them. Gray mills are behind on the gray contracts.

Senator McKELLAR. Are there any other companies with which you were connected?

Mr. RICE. No, sir; those are the only two companies I had owned any stock in.

Senator McKELLAR. Your partnership was with Mr. Myrick?

Mr. RICE. Mr. Myrick.

Senator McKELLAR. What contract have you with Mr. Myrick about your firm business while you are down here?

Mr. RICE. None whatever. I sold out to Mr. Myrick. I have resigned and am no longer a member of the firm of Myrick & Rice. I am out of it entirely.

Senator McKELLAR. Who are the owners of that firm?

Mr. RICE. Mr. Myrick is the sole owner now of the firm.

Senator McKELLAR. Would you object to stating upon what terms you sold out that business?

Mr. RICE. Certainly; I will be glad to state. I sold out of the firm for $5,000, and all the interest that I had there for $15,000, the total amounting to $20,000. The $15,000, of course, was pay for back contracts on commercial business; nothing whatever on any Government business.

Senator McKELLAR. When were these transactions; last March, before you came down here?

Mr. RICE. Last March; yes.

Senator McKELLAR. At whose instance did you come?

Mr. RICE. At the request of Mr. Albert Scott and Mr. Miller Wilson.

Senator McKELLAR. What has become of Mr. Scott? What is he doing now?

Mr. RICE. I could not say. He is in Boston. I could not tell you just what he is doing.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Scott was interested in nearly all these mills, was he not?

Mr. RICE. I could not say.

Senator McKELLAR. You did not know that he had large interests in them?

Mr. RICE. No, sir; I did not know anything about it. In fact, I had never met Mr. Scott but once in 1917.

Senator McKELLAR. Mr. Scott, I do not believe, had any interest in any of these competing plants, but he had interests in all the cotton manufactories, or was represented in them.

Mr. DONALD. Only a very few, Senator.

Senator McKELLAR. That is neither here nor there. It does not make any difference.

Mr. DONALD. Of his firm, Lockwood Green was agent for three or four or five cotton mills.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, what dyeing concerns among those you have here were represented by Myrick & Rice?

Mr. RICE. On the commercial business only, the Martin Dyeing & Finishing Co. We never had anything to do with Government business.

Senator McKELLAR. The Martin Dyeing & Finishing Co. at Bridgeton?

Mr. RICE. Yes. The Government business was entirely handled by Mr. Fred S. Bennett.

Senator McKELLAR. Where is he?

Mr. RICE. In New York City.

Senator McKELLAR. He represents the Martin Dyeing & Finishing Co.?

Mr. RICE. He is the representative of the Martin company on Government business only.

Senator McKELLAR. He never has been connected with the Government in any way?

Mr. RICE. No; not to my knowledge.

Mr. BAILEY. Never.

Senator McKELLAR. Was he ever here in Washington?

Mr. BAILEY. Not in any official capacity.

Senator McKELLAR. Did he work here for the Government at all.

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir.

Senator McKELLAR. In an unofficial capacity?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no, sir. He was an original member of the cotton-goods committee of the Council of National Defense.

Senator McKELLAR. That is, of the old Council of National Defense?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. How long did he serve with that committee?

Mr. BAILEY. He served from April until June. I am speaking from recollection. He resigned very early from that.

Senator McKELLAR. So that he was connected with this cotton-goods committee of the Council of National Defense, which had in charge these things?

Mr. BAILEY. He was on the cotton-goods committee of the committee on supply, the subsidiary committee representing the industry.

Senator McKELLAR. Were there any other firms that your firm represented, Mr. Rice, besides the Martin Dyeing & Finishing Co.?

Mr. RICE. Yes; the Mansfield Bleachery.

Senator McKELLAR. At Mansfield, Mass.?

Mr. RICE. At Mansfield, Mass.

Senator McKELLAR. Any others?

Mr. RICE. The Southbridge Printing Co.; the Fiskdale Finishing Co.; the Slatersville Finishing Co., at Slatersville, R. I.; the Edgewater Dyeing & Finishing Co., of Philadelphia.

Senator McKELLAR. The Martin, the Mansfield, the Southbridge, the Slatersville; and were there any others?

Mr. RICE. The Edgewater. I believe there were eight.

Senator McKELLAR. You have named six of them. Have all these concerns gotten contracts from the Government?
Mr. RICE. No, sir.
Senator McKELLAR. Which ones have not?
Mr. RICE. The Martin Co.——
Senator McKELLAR. The Martin Co. has not?
Mr. RICE. The Martin Co. has had contracts.
Senator McKELLAR. All right, sir.
Mr. RICE. The Edgewater has had contracts; the Southbridge and the Fiskdale have had contracts.
Senator McKELLAR. And the Mansfield?
Mr. RICE. They had one or two contracts in the spring.
Senator McKELLAR. The Slatersville?
Mr. RICE. Only one or two, recently. We have been giving them some recently.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, before the recess is taken I think we should point out to the Senator from Nevada that the amendment which he proposes to this bill undoubtedly will delay the bill in conference. This is one of the most important bills which has come before the Senate. It involves the settlement of nearly $2,000,000,000 worth of contracts. This legislation should have been passed two months ago; and I do hope the Senator will not press that amendment on this bill when the time comes.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I renew my motion for a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 29, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lead us, O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, by Thy counsels through the remaining congressional hours of this day.

Give to these Representatives of our people clear minds, conscientious scruples, high ideals, that they may hallow Thy name in all the legislative acts they may record in history. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4887. An act making an appropriation for a sewer system at the Carson Indian School at Stewart, Nev.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2784) to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate resolution 430.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that the Vice President, under the second resolution, had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. KING, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. WARREN, Mr. BAIRD, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. KNOX as said committee on the part of the Senate.

Also the following resolution:

Senate resolution 422.

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Also the following resolution:

Senate resolution 423.

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of Hon. WILLIAM HUGHES, late a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4887. An act making an appropriation for a sewer system at the Carson Indian School at Stewart, Nev.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE RAILROADS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to insert in the RECORD some resolutions passed by the State Senate of Texas touching the railroad question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state what is the nature of the resolutions?

Mr. GARNER. They express the opinion that the railroads ought to be turned back to the owners of them. If the gentleman wants to know the substance of it, that is what it is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the resolutions referred to:

Whereas postwar and reconstruction conditions have brought these United States of America many problems of great import, and perhaps the one of greatest importance is the question of Government ownership of the railways of the United States; and

Whereas our great democratic President, in whose wisdom we have every reason to confide, in his address to Congress on December 2, said: "The question which causes me the greatest concern is the question of the policy to be adopted toward the railroads. I frankly turn to your counsel upon it"; and after making other illuminating statements on this subject, further says, "Let me say at once that I have no answer ready. The only thing that is perfectly clear to me is that it is not fair either to the public or to the owners of the railroads to leave the question unanswered and that it will presently become my duty to relinquish control of the roads, even before the expiration of the statutory period, unless there shall appear some clear prospect in the meantime of a legislative solution. Their release would at least produce one element of its solution, namely, certainty and a quick stimulation of private initiative"; and

Whereas in wisdom, so characteristic of the man, our President has turned to Congress for counsel on this momentous subject, in his keen sense of justice endeavoring to deal fairly with the owners of the railroads and protectively to the public welfare; and

Whereas we feel that the Congress of the United States will, by being informed of public sentiment, be better able to solve and direct the course of the problem, and recognizing the necessity, as expressed in the President's address, of relinquishing control of the railroads as quickly as possible and the certainty of conditions that said release of the railroads by the Federal Government would immediately establish; therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of this the Thirty-sixth Legislature of the State of Texas, That we favor the return of the railroads to their owners as immediately as it can be accomplished without confusion or losses; be it further

Resolved, That we believe and think private ownership under strong Government control and regulation in service, income, and disbursements is desirable, and we do not believe Federal Government ownership of railroads is for the best interests of the people at this time; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate forward properly authenticated copies of this resolution to each United States Senator and Member of Congress from Texas for their consideration, and a copy to the chief clerks of the house of representatives and the senate of each State.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter of Chief Justice Taney, under date of February 16, 1863, known as his remonstrance against the imposition of an income tax upon judicial salaries, and also the opinion of Attorney General Hoar in relation to the same. I do this for the benefit of the conferees of the House and the few lurking lovers of the Constitution throughout the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OVERMAN ACT.

Mr. GOULD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GOULD. I rise to make a privileged motion, Mr. Speaker. I move to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of House resolution 481.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman recognized for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. He has a privileged resolution, unless somebody can pick a hole in it. [Laughter.] The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 481.

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to inform the House of Representatives of the result, in detail, of his administration of the provisions of the so-called Overman Act, approved May 20, 1918, entitled "An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order that keeps it from being privileged?

Mr. WEBB. I have only examined it casually, but——

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the committee two or three weeks ago.

Mr. WEBB. I have not been requested as chairman of the committee to act upon the resolution at all.

The SPEAKER. That is it.

Mr. WEBB. The clerk of the committee spoke to me about it and said it was not privileged, and therefore no immediate action was taken on it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear from that reading that it is calling upon the President to express an opinion as to the result.

The SPEAKER. Where does it call upon the President for that?

Mr. WEBB. It asks for the results in detail.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows it asks for results in detail; but two and two make four, and such stuff as that.

Mr. WEBB. That is very true; but to call on the President for the results of a thing is to call upon him for an expression of opinion.

The SPEAKER. I do not see why.

Mr. MANN. It is a question of fact.

Mr. WEBB. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. It does not seem to me he calls upon him for a fact. If he did, it would be a privileged question; but it seems to me he calls upon him for the result of the Overman resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt whatever that it is privileged. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to discharge the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The question is on the gentleman's motion to discharge the committee.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 18, noes 22.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. WEBB and Mr. GOULD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 19.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. GOULD was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. I ask that the report be read. It is brief.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of district courts of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law.

"The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals shall receive salaries equal in amount to the salaries provided by this act to be paid judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, payable monthly from the Treasury."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I caught the reading of the conference report, it said that the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as those fixed by the bill for judges of the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the same salaries as the judges of the United States circuit courts.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it is not necessary that there be harmony in legislation coming from the Committee on the Judiciary, and it may be that I am under a misapprehension. My recollection is that while there is no circuit court there are circuit judges and district judges, and we fix the salaries of the district judges and then we fix the salaries of the circuit judges. Now, the gentleman introduces a new title for circuit judges, by calling them "judges of the circuit court of appeals."

Mr. GARNER. That is what they are.

Mr. MANN. That is not what they are, so far as the law providing for the fixing of their salaries is concerned. At least my recollection is that the circuit court of appeals is constituted by the sitting of circuit judges. As I say, I do not suppose it is necessary that there be harmony; but if my recollection is right, it does not look very well for Congress in the same act to provide a salary for a circuit judge and then refer to it as a salary for a judge of the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. WEBB. That is the language the Senate used, I will say to my friend.

Mr. MANN. I can not help that. I am not talking about the language the Senate used, I am talking about the language that the conferees used.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we adopted their language.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I will not say anything further about the Senate.

Mr. GARNER. Let it go at that.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know but I might agree with the gentleman, but it was the Senate's language and expresses the thought and meaning intended.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has changed it in conference.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; but we changed according to the Senate's suggestion and language, though.

Mr. MANN. Oh! Then, of course, we are ready to believe that the House conferees agreed upon all the Senate amendments except certain amendments which the House conferees insisted should be changed to correspond with the desire of the Senate managers in the conference.

Mr. WEBB. I think my friend is "sticking in the bark"—too technical The gentleman can not tell the difference between the circuit court of appeals and the circuit judges constituting the circuit court of appeals. The one is interchangeable with the other in common language. That is the way we looked at it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman to explain to the House the action of the conferees relative to the Court of Claims and to the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia as to whether they are included in the proposition for a Federal judiciary?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that the House, as he remembers, increased the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims $1,500, as we increased the salary of every district and circuit judge in the United States. When the bill went to the Senate they increased the salary still more and made it $8,500 instead of $7,500. In conference the Senate receded, and we reduced the amount allowed to the judges of the Court of Claims back to where the House put it, $7,500. We have included the Senate amendment giving the District of Columbia supreme court judges the same increase as other judges, $1,500. We felt that was nothing but right and fair. If it had not gone out on a point of order, I think the House would have adopted the increase when the bill was here on this floor. Everyone knows that the District of Columbia is one of the costliest places in the United States to live in, and we could see no reason why we should not agree to give these supreme court judges here, who are declared by law to be district judges of the United States, just like other judges throughout the United States, the $1,500 increase, especially when the city of Washington pays half of that increase. We thought that was perfectly fair that we should do that.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state to the House what changes were made in the provision of the House bill by the conferees with reference to the forcible retirement of judges?

Mr. WEBB. None at all.

Mr. DENISON. I think there are some changes there, are there not?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. DENISON. There are some shown on this document that I have here.

Mr. WEBB. It is a mere change of language. There is no change in the substance of the law at all. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like five minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of doubt in my mind as to whether some of the courts added by the conferees are properly Federal courts. I make the statement after very considerable investigation and a knowledge there has been a difference of judicial expression as to whether these are Federal courts or not. They are called district courts. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is a variant one, and the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is, of course, based upon the primary jurisdiction of the supreme court.

Now, assuming that they come within the purview of being United States courts, and I myself do not believe they do, since they are not a part of the Federal judicial system—assuming that they do, we are called upon by what may not be unfairly termed "legislation by favoritism" to include a number of judges of the District of Columbia in the increase of salaries, when by no possible means could there be any further extension than to say that one judge's salary having been increased the others will be so entitled. There is no question but what the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia do some Federal business—such as injunctions and mandamus of Cabinet officers peculiar to this District—and there can be no contention, Mr. Speaker, that these men, the entire number of judges, six in number, do more business than any one judge in any particular district court of the United States.

Therefore under the guise of the increase of salary of Federal judges we are increasing the salaries of these men who sit as the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in cases almost entirely local for doing a Federal business which is but an incident to their appointment as district judges, and district judges, so called, because this is a governmental reservation known as the District of Columbia.

Now, I call the attention of the House to the report of the Attorney General of the United States, which all might read with profit, concerning the work of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. This is the disclosure of business: There were pending at the close of June 30, 1917, 17 patent cases, 77 civil cases, 2 criminal cases, or a total of 96. In 1918 there were pending 64 patent cases, 49 civil cases, 6 criminal cases, a total of 119.

It is also interesting to read in the same report of the courts in the District of Columbia, in which a statement is made as to civil cases to which the United States was a party. These civil cases are designated first at the close of business June 30, 1918, as being 1 safety-appliance case, 1 hours-of-service case, 6 forfeiture cases under proceedings of the food and drug act, and unclassified business 46, which includes all cases of the most minor and ex parte cases. This is the Federal business which the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia are doing.

In criminal cases it is also interesting to note that they terminated 20 cases pertaining to internal revenue, and this was their method of terminating them: Eleven pleaded guilty and there were 9 pleas of nolle prosequi. Under the post-office cases there were 9 convictions only, 1 nolle prosequi, and 7 pleaded guilty. Under the food and drugs act there were 166 pleas of guilty, and under the interstate-commerce cases there was 1 plea of guilty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. There were 46 cases under the interstate-commerce laws which were discontinued and dismissed. There is a statement of cases to which the United States was not a party, which showed a great volume of business, amounting to 10,546 cases. So that the contention I make, Mr. Speaker, is that the judges in the District of Columbia, being a part of the Federal governmental reservation, and having its peculiar jurisdiction necessarily incident to this District, are not, in the broadest sense of the word, Federal judges. They only come within the scope of that name because of the certain limited and peculiar jurisdiction which they may have. It occurs to me that the inclusion of these courts without committee recommendation is what may be termed legislation by favoritism, and I regret that the bill has taken the peculiar angle it has, since I was one of those who supported the proposition that in certain instances which were governed by population and business necessarily I felt that there was ground for some increase in the salary of the Federal judges. But I can not bring myself to the belief that as a general proposition the flat salary or level extension all over the country should have been adopted as a change from the bill as originally presented by the Committee on the Judiciary to this House.

Nor can I bring myself to the belief that the interests of justice are best subserved by incorporating two or three courts which are peculiarly local in their character. The Court of Claims, while possibly Federal, is not strictly a court. It can be best described as being a judicial commission to find facts. These other courts, it seems, are peculiarly and particularly local in their character and in their work.

Now, it can not be said that because these men reside in the District of Columbia, where the price of living has been high, that therefore this salary increase should come to them, because that would apply to every local court in the United States more or less, and the fact is that here in the District of Columbia there has been little or no effort on the part of organized District authority or local interests to prohibit, suppress, or control the acknowledged extortion and profiteering which everyone whose business has called him here has experienced.

I desired to inform the House of this matter, because for the public welfare there should here be an understanding of the conduct of judicial business in this District. In the report of the pending judicial business of the District of Columbia there is carried something over 10,000 cases, including nearly 7,000 criminal cases. That is a manifest error. The truth of it is there is not one-tenth of that amount of real criminal business in the District of Columbia. If there were over 10,000 undisposed of cases demanding trial in the District of Columbia there would be such a hue and cry for adjudication, and a rightful hue and cry, that it could not be denied; but the fact is that the clerk's office carries here this great number of 10,000 or more cases in the District of Columbia under a technicality which continues them in operation, and which makes of each motion or any procedure in the criminal case a special case until finally disposed of, and they build it up so that in the report there now appears, as I said, something over 10,000 cases. This is a matter that is not fair to the District of Columbia, and it is not fair to the general and proper understanding of the work of the judges here or of the judicial system.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, just one word in reply to that. There is a great demand in this District for more judges on this District Supreme Court. I was talking with a distinguished ex-Member of this House yesterday, a gentleman who came from the Speaker's own State, and he said that the situation in the District of Columbia was a positive denial of justice, and was inuring to the benefit of the corporations of this city, because if a poor man wanted to sue one of them he could not get a trial within two years, although he might have a good claim for $10,000. The corporation can drift the thing along, and finally might compromise it for $2,000. This House has twice passed a bill giving two additional judges to this court, and the Senate passed it once, but it died in conference, because we could not get an agreement upon an amendment. I say without fear of contradiction that it is the hardest worked Federal or nisi prius court in the United States. They have more drudgery work to do than any Federal judges in the United States. They keep court open more days than any judges; they sit there nine months every year, and the court is never closed, even when they take a little summer vacation. Tell me why it is that when the law creating these courts declares them as having all of the power and jurisdiction of district and circuit court judges, and when, in addition to that work, they do all of the duties of a nisi prius court in this Capital City—tell me why we should go all over this great country, even into the gentleman's own State of Ohio, and give the judges an increase of $1,500, give to the Hawaiian and Porto Rican judges this increase, and yet leave out the hardest worked judges in America? The conferees would not agree to it, and I hope the House will not agree to it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is not the real trouble in this city the fact that they have a most inadequate judicial code?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I agree with the gentleman that the Judicial Code of this District might be amended, and the judges on that bench have been before the gentleman's committee and mine for the last three years trying to get us to amend it so as to take some of the heavy work off them, but we have not done it. The lower courts now have jurisdiction to send a man to jail for one year. That is one way in which we could relieve the congestion in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman recall the statement of the distinguished ex-Member of this House, and also of the body at the other end of the Capitol, who said that since he had been practicing at the bar of the District of Columbia that there were only three cases of sufficient importance to attract his consideration?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and he said he never cared for more than six cases at a time in any or all the courts, but that is no criterion. He came before the committee and said that one of the hardest worked benches in the world was the District of Columbia bench, and said most earnestly that it ought to have a larger increase in salaries than we are giving here. Remember the people of this District pay one-half of this increase. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MCARTHUR, Mr. HAWLEY was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of illness.

FOOD RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 998).

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up the conference report on the food-relief bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and the amendment amending the title of the bill; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following and transpose the same so that it will precede the word "as," in line 7, on page 1 of the bill:

"Provided, however, That Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor now or formerly subjects of Turkey may be included within the populations to receive relief under this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, namely:

On No. 1: Inserts the amendment, proposed by the Senate, including among the peoples to receive relief under the act Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor now subjects of Turkey, transported so that it will more clearly make certain that relief may be granted to such peoples whether they are subjects of Turkey or not, and whether or not they are living in enemy territory.

On No. 2: Inserts the amendment, proposed by the Senate, excluding from the relief authorized in this bill populations of German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey.

On Nos. 3 and 4: Provides, as proposed by the Senate, that expenditures under the act shall be audited in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government.

On Nos. 5 and 6: Provides, as proposed by the Senate, for the report of an itemized statement of receipts and expenditures made under the act.

On No. 7: Inserts the amendment, proposed by the Senate, requiring that so far as said fund shall be expended for the purchase of wheat, preference shall be given to grain grown in the United States.

The House agrees to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill.

SWAGAR SHERLEY,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there was one substantive proposition placed upon the bill as it passed the Senate, and that was to make clear that among the populations in Europe that should be included within the relief to be afforded by the bill were Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor. As the amendments, which were numbered 1 and 2, were offered and agreed to by the Senate the effect of No. 2 would have been to nullify and destroy in part amendment No. 1, because the bill as it passed the House provided for the relief of various populations in Europe and territory contiguous thereto, outside of Germany. The Senate undertook to include in amendment No. 1 the countries I have enumerated, and then in No. 2 provided that the relief should be to populations outside of Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. The very class they wanted to include were populations inside German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. The conferees carried out the spirit of the Senate amendment by providing that the relief should go to the populations in Europe and contiguous territory and the enumerated classes of Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations, excluding all of Germany and others than the enumerated class I have just spoken of in Austria, Hungary, and in Turkey. The other amendments of the Senate were amendments that undertook to make it more clear that there should be a complete audit and detailed report of receipts and expenditures, and the House was very glad to accept those Senate amendments.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman give substantially the language of the exclusions in the bill as finally agreed upon?

Mr. SHERLEY. The exclusions of the bill are Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, and Turkey——

Mr. STAFFORD. And Bulgaria.

Mr. SHERLEY. And Bulgaria, except Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia Minor, now or formerly subject to Turkey, may be included with the populations to receive relief. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

LIGNITE COALS AND PEAT—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 972).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 3220.

Mr. SHERLEY. May I ask, pending the gentleman's motion, how long the gentleman proposes to take? It was the understanding of the House on yesterday that the House would consider the deficiency bill this morning.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose it will take very long, but I can not inform the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. What is the conference report?

Mr. FOSTER. On the lignite bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2 and 3, and agree to the same.

M. D. FOSTER,
OTIS WINGO,
E. E. DENISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
T. J. WALSH,
MILES POINDEXTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to Senate bill 3220, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, submit the following statement in explanation of the action taken by the conference committee, and respectfully submit the following statement as to the action of the managers on the part of the House:

Amendment No. 1: Page 1, line 5, the managers on the part of the House receded from its amendment and agreed to the same, restoring the words "and peat," so if the conference report is adopted and the bill becomes a law it will permit investigations in reference to peat as a fuel.

Amendment No. 2: Page 1, line 10, the House struck out "$150,000" and inserted "$100,000." The Senate receded from its disagreement to this amendment, leaving the amount as fixed by House, "$100,000."

Amendment No. 3: Section 2, page 2, the amendment was placed in the bill by the House and the Senate receded and agreed to the same. This is an amendment providing that when the investigation is completed the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to sell or otherwise dispose of property used in the investigation and make a report to Congress of the results of such experiments and investigations.

M. D. FOSTER,
OTIS WINGO,
E. E. DENISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the Senate bill was under consideration, no consideration whatsoever was given to the amendment of the committee striking out of the Senate bill authority to the Bureau of Mines to investigate peat production. Now, I understand that the conferees have agreed to restore the word "peat," so as to include peat with lignite-coal production in this investigation?

Mr. FOSTER. Peat was stricken out because it was thought we would only investigate lignite coal, but after investigation further it was found they could do this on the $100,000, so we restored it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question was not so much the feasibility but merely to use up the $100,000?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it was not that at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; then I misunderstood his explanation as to the reason for including peat.

Mr. FOSTER. We eliminated peat——

Mr. STAFFORD. I remember when the bill was under consideration some one stated they would strongly oppose having an investigation made as to the commercial value of peat as a fuel product, and it was eliminated by the committee and no consideration was given to it on the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. There could not be; it was passed under suspension of the rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. That emphasizes more the need, perhaps, of some real explanation as to why peat was included within the purview of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The conferees talked with the head of the Bureau of Mines, and he thought they could make this investigation of peat. There were some men from the States of Minnesota and Florida who were very insistent, especially from Florida, in having that language restored, and so it was done after finding we could do that on the amount of money provided, $100,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman quite sure it will not go beyond $100,000?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the limit of the amount in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have many times known of a limit on appropriations where bureaus, especially the Bureau of Mines, have come to Congress for a larger appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. I can not say as to that; the gentleman and myself will not be here next session.

Mr. STAFFORD. And we will not be responsible after this term of Congress for the raid of these bureaus upon the Treasury.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Was not this bill originally introduced as a war measure?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that it was——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman himself here told us so. Now the war is over and the gentleman presses it just the same.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is wrong. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

SECOND DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15140, the second deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to act as Chairman of this committee, but he has been called out for a few minutes to his office, and the Chair will ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to act until the gentleman from Texas returns.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15140, the second deficiency bill, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15140, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15140) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may have such time as he desires to explain the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bill which is now presented to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, while designated a deficiency bill, is very much more than a deficiency bill. It makes provision for an appropriation of several hundred million dollars to take care of existing and anticipated deficiencies, and if it stopped there it would differ from any other deficiency bill only in regard to detail, but it does very much more than that. It provides for the cancellation of appropriations made since the beginning of the war in an amount greater than $7,000,000,000, and it provides in addition for a cancellation of authorizations under which the departments could further obligate the Government of about $8,000,000,000.

And in this regard it is perhaps a bill without precedent, and let us hope it is a bill that in its magnitude may never need to be followed in the future.

When the war was declared against Germany, Congress pledged the entire resources of America to the prosecution of that war to a successful conclusion, and following that pledge Congress proceeded to appropriate from time to time amounts in the aggregate greater than had ever been dreamed of by any nation or any people at any previous time. Of necessity many of those amounts had to be voted on short notice and largely upon the statement of administrative officers, and particularly upon the statements made by the Army and Navy Departments touching the needs of the Government. That the action of Congress was wise is, to my mind, clearly shown by the results that flowed from those appropriations and from the conduct of the war. While individuals may quarrel or criticize as to particular achievements or lack of achievements on the part of the Government and of various bureaus of the Government, it can never be forgotten, and it never will be ignored by the true historian, that America's weight thrown, as it was, into the war at the time it was and to the extent it was made certain the result that has been accomplished [applause], and thereby, beyond the belief or hope of any of us, the war was shortened. If it has been shortened a month or a week or a day, whatever extra millions might have been voted and spent out of undue zeal were more than paid for in the saving of life, in the ending of this horrible world catastrophe, and in bringing us to a point where the world might look forward to a reconstruction that would mean a newer and a better and a more permanent civilization. So I feel that I voice not only my own views but the views of Congress and of the country generally, when I say that we have no apology for the very large sums of money that we appropriated under the conditions that confronted the country at the beginning of the war and up to the end of the war.

But just because we did appropriate such huge sums and appropriated them of necessity with haste, because to have made an inquiry into the detail of expenditure would have been to defeat the very purpose for which the appropriation was asked—just because, I say, we did make these appropriations, so now is it incumbent upon Congress and the Government to see to it that expenditures are brought to the narrowest possible extent consistent with the carrying out of the obligations that the Government has undertaken. And the Committee on Appropriations, having had in large measure thrown upon it the burden of appropriating much of these vast sums, peculiarly felt the obligation upon it of now endeavoring to recover and to take back appropriations and authorizations that had been made with a view of the war's continuation and which are not now necessary.

I doubt if many can realize the tremendous responsibilities that were placed upon some of us who by fortune or chance found ourselves in a position where we had to take the initiative in matters of such magnitude that all previous responsibilities pale in comparison with them. Speaking for myself, I know that I have never gone through—and I hope never to go through again—a year that brought with it heavier responsibilities or a more complete realization of my own inadequate facilities for meeting in the full those responsibilities. And in the days that we were appropriating these many millions of dollars I determined that if a Member of this House when the war should cease I would endeavor to show as much zeal in safeguarding the expenditures of the Government and in covering back into the Treasury appropriations no longer needed as I had shown in the making of those appropriations in order to facilitate the vigorous prosecution of the war. [Applause.]

When the armistice was signed, upon the 11th day of November, I realized that it was necessary that Congress should immediately ascertain conditions in connection with our expenditures and should immediately take steps looking to prevent their continuation except to the very least degree required. And so on the 27th day of November, prior to the convening of Congress for the regular session, during an informal meeting of the Committee on Appropriations and as the result of their approval of the proposal I then submitted to them, I sent the following letter to every Cabinet officer and to the head of every independent organization in the Government:

NOVEMBER 27, 1918.

It is the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives to begin hearings next Monday with the view of returning to the Treasury such appropriations and the cancellation of such authorizations, or parts thereof, granted in connection with the prosecution of the war, as no longer may be required under present conditions.

The committee has no desire to interfere with the equitable and legal execution of such contracts or to abolish or curtail such services as may be vitally necessary to the period of national readjustment, but realizes that large sums placed at the disposal of many departments for use during the war now may be covered into the Treasury without injury to the public service or the general welfare of the country.

The difficulty which some branches of the service may have in making absolutely accurate settlements of accounts at this time is appreciated, and the committee would be pleased if you would acquaint the various officials of your office with its purpose, so that you may be prepared when called upon to present the best information available.

Following that, informal talks were had with various heads of the departments, and particularly with Army and Navy officials. It became apparent at once that these various departments were not in a position to present immediately that sort of financial statement which was almost a necessary predicate to any work that the committee might do; and it required a good many days of constant conference and talk with these various heads to get financial tables before the committee and undertake to show the following facts:

First. The amounts that had been appropriated since April 6, 1917, including any available balances that existed as of that date.

Second. The amounts that had been expended as of November 1, 1918.

Third. The contract obligations that the Government had undertaken and which it might be required to meet in full or in part.

Fourth. The additional needs, if any, that might confront the department for the balance of the fiscal year.

Fifth. A statement as to what sums, in the judgment of the various departments, might not now be necessary and could be covered into the Treasury.

Gentlemen will find these various tables printed in the hearings as they have been finally revised. They have gone through a number of evolutions, and repeatedly the committee was faced with a situation where it would have to postpone a hearing until statements might be put into a form that would enable it really to ascertain some of the facts.

And all of this grows out of a situation that has impressed itself upon me for many years, to which from time to time I have called the attention of the Congress, and which has been accentuated to a degree that can not be overstated since the war started, and that is the absolutely inadequate and obsolete method of bookkeeping employed by the Government. The Congress which is to follow this one can perform no greater duty to the country than to provide for a modern up-to-date system of bookkeeping that shall be uniform in all the departments. I shall not now permit myself to be diverted as to other reforms that are connected with this reform, but if the committee had had brought to it statements conforming to one system of bookkeeping, even though it be a bad one, its labors would have been infinitely lightened instead of having constantly to consider all sorts of methods of presenting balances and statements of financial accounts; we would no sooner become acquainted with one system than we would be presented with another that might be as good or better, but which represented simply the view of a particular department. We have tried in the statements that are filed in the hearings to present financial statements that in their general form correspond with each other.

Now, it is well that there should be stated to the House at the outset what the committee has not done as well as what it has undertaken to do, because we do not desire that either the Congress or the departments themselves should misunderstand the scope of the action taken by the committee, which we hope will be ratified by the Congress. In recommending the repeal of various appropriations and the cancellation of various authorizations the committee does not mean in any sense or to any degree to say that in its judgment the sums that are left with the departments need in their entirety to be expended.

Now, I desire to emphasize that; that as to the moneys that we have covered back we do not, by covering them back, say that the moneys that are not taken back are needed in their entirety. The committee was faced with a task not only Herculean, but a task which, if performed in a radical or extreme manner, would bring about results very disastrous to the country. The obligations of this Government to its citizens and to third parties and to foreign governments run into billions of dollars. The committee might have made a paper showing greater than what is shown here by radically taking away moneys that had been appropriated to the various departments, with the result of very seriously crippling the departments in the meeting of the just debts of the Government. The committee undertook simply to take those moneys that from a survey of the situation as of this time were plainly not necessary in order to meet the obligations of the Government, that could not be canceled and the Government relieved of, and to carry on the activities which it must carry on until July 1 next.

Now, there necessarily came up from time to time questions about the Government's activity in the further prosecution of various enterprises undertaken during the war; and individual Members and the public generally may want to know why it was that the committee did not undertake by its action to prevent the doing of this thing or the other thing. All that is needed in response to that suggestion is a statement, a bare outline, of the problem that it would have involved. The moneys that necessarily must be left with the Army and Navy Departments are so great that any individual enterprise, even though it involved a number of millions of dollars, could be carried on out of those funds without any appreciable effect upon the amount of the funds as of this time, and therefore if we were to endeavor, by taking away moneys, to prevent particular activities being carried on, we would have to go into such a detailed examination of the entire activities as would involve a rigid segregation of all moneys for particular purposes.

Now, that is manifestly an impossible task. The Ordnance Department has 15,000 major contracts and 70,000 subsidiary contracts. The same is true in less degree of many of the other departments. In point of fact, I should mention what I had intended to state in the beginning, that while the committee started out with the idea of making a survey of the appropriations that had been made to all of the departments of the Government, it soon found itself in a position where it would not be able to report a bill until so near the end of the session as to imperil its enactment if it undertook so ambitious a program. And so it has confined its recommendations to the War and Navy Departments, and in dealing with them has dealt with the major problems that confronted the Congress and the country touching expenditures.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman give us an estimate of the total expenditures for this year?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am going to come to all of that later on, if the gentleman will permit.

There has been appropriated since the war started for the Military Establishment proper $24,235,425,260.35. There have been total disbursements as of December 1, 1918, of $9,899,057,601.41, leaving a cash balance as of December 1 of $14,336,367,658.94. There is recommended in this bill to be covered into the Treasury—to be repealed as appropriations, to speak more accurately—$6,844,795,077.70, which would leave a balance remaining to the Military Establishment of $7,491,572,581.24.

The bill proposes a repeal of 28.2 per cent of the appropriations that have been made for the Military Establishment since the war started. As to the authorizations that have been made for the Military Establishment and which have not been covered by appropriations, they amounted to $8,521,309,662, and of those authorizations there is recommended as a repeal by this bill $8,190,029,294.70, or 96 per cent.

Now, it is perhaps wise to make a statement here, not for the House, which is familiar with the matter, but in order that the country may not misunderstand the scope of the bill, both as it deals with appropriations and with authorizations. The action of this Congress, if it shall pass this bill, does not mean that we put $7,000,000,000 in cash into the Treasury. It means that warrants upon the Treasury which Congress has given to the departments in that amount of cash have been taken away; that they have not been permitted longer to have the right, for the purposes for which the appropriations have been made, to draw upon the Treasury for that amount of money. And, of course, that does not carry with it the opinion that a casual or ignorant observer of Government finances might have, that we were actually placing that amount of money in the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "ignorant people" have that impression. Still that is the impression the newspapers have had, apparently; and is it not an error in connection with this bill to print a note which reads:

Repeal of appropriations and authorizations.

Military Establishment:
Cash	$6,844,795,077.50
Authorization	8,190,029,294.70
		$15,034,824,372.40
Naval Establishment:
Cash	334,361,866.98
Authorization	31,000,000.00
		365,361,866.98
		15,400,186,239.38

Would not any educated persons reading that receive the same impression?

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps, from the standpoint of people who are not familiar with the technical use of these phrases in connection with legislation; but the gentleman will understand that the committee printed that note in the bill in order that those who are familiar with Government methods of appropriation and finance might be technically advised. So we spoke of cash which had been appropriated and of authorizations.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had said "appropriations," it would have been technically correct, but when the gentleman speaks of it as cash it is not technically correct.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, if I have not made a greater mistake than that in connection with this very great task I shall be happy.

Mr. MANN. I do not know. That grave mistake has gone out all over the country, through the newspapers stating that the Committee on Appropriations has recommended that there be covered back into the Treasury of the United States about $7,000,000,000 in cash. That is a tremendous mistake to go out over the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think all the newspapers have carried it that way.

Mr. MANN. All that I saw did. I do not know. I did not see them all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Even the gentleman does not see them all.

Mr. MANN. I do not see many of them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I took occasion to explain to quite a number of the newspaper correspondents who came to see me touching the matter just what was meant, and if there has been the great mistake which the gentleman thinks has been made, I hope the statement now made by me, and the gentleman's statement, will serve to correct it before it does any further damage.

Now, touching authorizations, there has been in the Congress for a great many years, from time to time, the practice of authorizing obligations to be incurred by departments rather than voting the direct appropriation, in order that we might have in many ways a more fluid status for moneys in the Treasury, and when the last deficiency bill passed Congress just before the adjournment of the last session the Committee on Appropriations carried the major part of those appropriations in the way of authorizations, because there were some of us in the committee who believed that the war was at an end. I personally held that belief. Yet I was not in a position to act legislatively upon what was simply a belief, and it was necessary that the Congress should make provision for the further prosecution of the war, because in the event that my belief or other people's belief should be in error the result of a failure to provide would be disastrous, and it was a responsibility that no man would be willing to take or that the Congress would be willing to take. The result was that we appropriated very large sums of money and authorized obligations in still greater sums of money in a bill that did not become a law until the 4th day of November, and the armistice was signed just one week later. So it results that we are able now to cancel the very large authorizations of which I have spoken. Appropriations for the Military Establishment were originally predicated upon an army of a million men, but that idea rapidly expanded until we were appropriating at the end for an army of 4,850,000 men and, in regard to ordnance, were making provision not only for 80 divisions abroad and 18 at home but a further reserve back of that. It follows inevitably, therefore, that with the cessation of active fighting abroad and the reduction of the size of the Army very great sums for pay, subsistence, transportation, forage, clothing, and various other activities of the Government were no longer necessary, and a large amount of these appropriations that are now to be canceled are cancelable because of that major fact.

The same situation existed in regard to the Navy. We started out with a Navy that had a strength of about 54,000 men. We built up a Navy that had at its maximum peak 497,000 men. I hope we are going to get back to a Navy that will not be in excess of 225,000 men. All of that made necessary the very large appropriations that have been made. In point of fact the Navy estimates which were submitted for this current fiscal year were predicated upon a very much smaller number of men—314,000 men—and it is because of the Navy having reached a maximum peak of 497,000 men that we are met with and are carrying in this bill deficiencies amounting to $280,000,000.

The two great money-spending bureaus of the War Department are what we commonly speak of as the Quartermaster's Department and the Ordnance Department, though the old Quartermaster's Department as such has been very largely merged, if not entirely merged, into the Division of Purchase, Storage and Traffic. In regard to the Quartermaster's Department this situation exists: Touching all manner of supplies, save those which are bought from day to day, so to speak, or from time to time, like subsistence, we not only have a quantity on hand, but including what we will necessarily have to receive because of its having been in the process of manufacture, we have and will have amounts that, in the judgment of Gen. Wood, the head of the Quartermaster's Department, are sufficient to take care of the needs of the Army for the next year or two, and there will then be a very large surplus of supplies of various material, so that it is inconceivable that the Congress should be called upon to appropriate in connection with the Military Establishment, except here and there for some special articles, any money in connection with quartermaster stores other than those that relate to subsistence; and touching subsistence, as to canned goods we have a very large surplusage.

The problem, therefore, that confronted the Quartermaster's Department at the end of the war was not one of what it wanted to acquire, but what it could get rid of; and the effort has been made, and should continue to be made, to relieve the Government of all obligations entered into where the physical conditions permit. In other words, there is no excuse, speaking by and large, for the carrying out of any contract because of the desire for the goods that that contract was to supply. Our surplus was so great that the problem will be a problem of disposition rather than of acquiring additional quantities.

Now, touching the reductions of the Quartermaster Corps that are recommended in this bill, amounting to $3,740,385,307.76, that very large sum is made up of many items, but the major items for which we get return are as follows:

Subsistence	$700, 608, 753. 72
Regular supplies, which includes fuel, forage, and many other items	261, 914, 072. 05
Transportation	909, 142, 497. 98
Clothing	908, 303, 821. 82
Hospital construction	62, 189, 503. 88
Pay	654, 557, 911. 68
Inland and port storage and shipping facilities	50, 026, 000. 00

The House will understand that the estimates and appropriations for subsistence, pay, and other items were made on the basis of maintaining an army of a given size. As I have said, our estimates were made finally for an army which would be 4,850,000 men by July 1, 1919. It is the present program of the War Department, as far as you can accurately use the word program, to reduce the Army to a strength of 500,000 men by the 1st of July. Personally, I have attached no very great importance to statements as to the size that the Army would reach at a given date in the near future, because, to my mind, there are so many events of first importance yet in the making which will control that determination that any opinion now expressed, even by the highest officials, must be taken subject to variations that make it of very little value. But so far as the opinions have been expressed, they have been to the effect that they looked to a reduction of the Army to 500,000 men by the 1st of July. Manifestly, the size of the Army that may be overseas is dependent upon the events that are happening from day to day and the conclusions which may be reached by the peace conference and the time when those conclusions will be reached.

It was constantly testified that it was the desire of the department to demobilize the Army here at home and abroad as fast as possible. It is my understanding touching the Army at home that within the next 30 days there should be a complete demobilization, except as to very small units that may be necessary at various camps and cantonments in connection with the work of receiving men from over the seas.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman intend by saying that the intent to have an Army of 500,000 men by the 1st of July is that we expect to have an average Army of 500,000 during the next year, but not that we would get it reduced by the 1st of July?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman's statement of the proposition is more nearly what is likely to happen, The statement originally made was to have an Army reduced to 500,000 by the 1st of July. I never took any stock in it, because I was satisfied that events, which are stronger than men, would prevent any such reduction.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman has spoken of the enormous surplus of supplies for the Army. Will the gentleman state what authority there is in law for the disposition by the War Department of the supplies, whether any means of converting those supplies into cash have been considered. What brought up the question is the fact that I had a letter the other day in which there was reference to some two or three million pairs of rubbers, and there was some newspaper comment that the rubbers were to be sold at public auction. Can the gentleman state what the law is in respect to that and whether the matter has been considered?

Mr. SHERLEY. There was a provision carried in the Army bill, approved July 9, 1918, regarding the sale of war supplies, which is as follows:

Sale of war supplies: That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, through the head of any executive department, to sell, upon such terms as the head of such department shall deem expedient, to any person, partnership, association, corporation, or any other department of the Government, or to any foreign State or Government, engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, any war supplies, material, and equipment, and any by-products thereof, and any building, plant, or factory acquired since April 6, 1917, including the lands upon which the plant or factory may be situated, for the production of such war supplies, materials, and equipment which, during the present emergency, may have or may hereafter be purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States: Provided further, That sales of guns and ammunition made under the authority contained in this or any other act shall be limited to sales to other departments of the Government and to foreign States or Governments engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, and to members of the National Rifle Association and of other recognized associations organized in the United States for the encouragement of small-arms target practice: Provided further, That a detailed report shall be made to Congress on the first day of each regular session of the sales of any war supplies, matériel, lands, factories, or buildings, and equipment made under the authority contained in this or any other act, except sales made to any foreign State or Government engaged in war against any Government with which the United States is at war, showing the character of the articles sold, to whom sold, the price received therefor, and the purpose for which sold: Provided, That any moneys received by the United States as the proceeds of any such sale shall be deposited to the credit of that appropriation out of which was paid the cost to the Government of the property thus sold, and the same shall immediately become available for the purposes named in the original appropriation: Provided further, That there shall be allotted to the Aircraft Board, by the head of the bureau or department charged with the production of aircraft, from the appropriations herein made for aircraft production for the fiscal year 1918 and 1919, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which money shall be available during the fiscal year for the payment of such clerks or other employees, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as may be necessary for the conduct of its business, including such technical experts and advisors as may be found necessary; and for the payment of rental of offices in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, purchase of necessary office equipment and supplies, including scientific publications, printing, necessary administration and contingent expenses of said board.

Now, in this bill we are carrying a provision proposing to repeal that part of the statute which I have just read, which provides:

That any moneys received by the United States as the proceeds of any such sale shall be deposited to the credit of that appropriation out of which was paid the cost to the Government of the property thus sold, and the same shall immediately become available for the purposes named in the original appropriation.

If the Congress should agree to the recommendations of the committee it would result that while the power for sale of war supplies is not taken away the receipts from such sales would be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, as has been the practice heretofore.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the demobilization of the Army, I understood the gentleman to say that the Army within this country expected to be practically demobilized within 30 days.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman, having made that statement, whether it is his belief or his hope?

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated it neither as a belief nor as a hope. I stated it as a statement made to me by—I am not sure what officer of the War Department, but I think either the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff.

Mr. MANN. It is the most important statement concerning the demobilization of the Army that has been made public in many a day. It has not been made public through the newspapers, to which the Army refers us for our information generally. It has not been made public to other Members of Congress. One gentleman here says that it was in last night's paper. Perhaps it came from a hearing.

Mr. SHERLEY. It did not come from me, for I did not make the statement publicly until a moment ago.

Mr. ALMON. It was stated in the Star last night as having come from Gen. March in a hearing before some Senate committee yesterday.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the gentleman will realize that with the tremendous amount of testimony I have taken I could not trust my memory as to details.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. But my impression is that Gen. March made the statement before the committee recently.

Mr. MANN. I would like to see some of it, if it is being carried into effect. It will have to be very speedy to get them demobilized in 30 days. That is what we have been told all of the time—they are going to demobilize very rapidly, but I would rather see them being demobilized than to hear about it.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman resumes his argument, I would like to ask him this question, because I think there is no man in the House so well qualified to answer it as the gentleman from Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman to tell the House in round numbers how many billions of dollars have been appropriated since we entered the war? How much of that amount was direct appropriations, and how much authorization, and what part of it is in appropriation and what part is authorization, which is canceled by this bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has added to the value of his compliment by the character of his question. I do not know that I can give anything like an accurate reply to a statement so all embracing as that. But, as I stated a while ago, there had been appropriated for the Army something over $24,235,000,000 since the beginning of the war, and practically all of the authorizations which have been granted to the Army are either repealed here or have been taken care of by the appropriations of cash made and which are included in the sum of $24,235,000,000, so that speaking by and large there have been appropriated for the Military Establishment, as such, about twenty-four and a quarter billions of dollars. For the Navy there has been appropriated $3,376,000,000.

Some of that went to the three-year building program of the Navy and may or not be classed as direct war appropriations. These figures, of course, do not include the appropriations that have been made in connection with the shipping program nor the appropriations that have been made in connection with a great many other activities, and I am not prepared now to present in detail a statement as to total appropriations. I hope a little later on to deal with the question that was inquired about by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] as to expenditures made by the Government and the amount that will likely be expended during this fiscal year. Roughly speaking, we disbursed during the fiscal year 1918 something over $12,696,000,000, and a little over $1,229,000,000 during the last three months of the fiscal year 1917. It is estimated that we will spend this fiscal year something like $18,000,000,000. Many believe that it is likely to be as much as $19,000,000,000, which would indicate that since the war started and to June 30, 1919, the expenditures of the Government would be somewhere between thirty-two and thirty-three billion dollars; but all of these statements necessarily are rather loose estimates, because there are a great many obligations that have not reached the form of actual expenditure and necessarily for a number of years to come there will be matters coming up for adjustment and payments growing out of the war. I doubt if there is anybody in the world now who knows accurately what the Civil War cost us. The public debt at the end of the Civil War was about $2,740,000,000, and estimates as to expenditures have been all the way from $5,000,000,000 on up. Speculating on it, and that is all anyone can do, I take it that something like thirty-three or thirty-four billion dollars would represent the cost of this war to the Government of the United States exclusive of interest on the debt.

Mr. BUTLER. Would that include the loans to the allies?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to the subject the gentleman was discussing before the question was dropped, in my listening to the reading of the law it seemed to me that the sale of the unused facilities that have been purchased by the departments would be limited to some other department of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think the gentleman did not catch the detailed language of the text. It provided for the sale to individuals, associations, corporations, or to other departments of the Government, and to foreign Governments that were at war with any Government with which we were at war.

Mr. FESS. So that the Government might sell unused material to any buyer in the open market.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under that law I take it that as to property that has been acquired since the beginning of the war they could so dispose of it; and, in fact, they did dispose of very large quantities of material during the active period of the war in connection with aircraft matters. The gentleman will recall that we supplied the allies with a great deal of material of various kinds, which we had manufactured or procured and which they needed in further manufacture of aircraft.

Mr. FESS. I think it is very necessary that we have that latitude. I want also to ask the gentleman whether in his judgment it would be better for the sale to be made by the heads of departments rather than by having an agency created by the Congress to dispose of this unused material.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was one of the men who foresaw the situation that was going to confront this country, and I undertook to deal with it in an affirmative way. The gentleman will recall that in the deficiency appropriation bill I alluded to a while ago, which was reported to Congress in October last, I carried there a provision for the creation of a commission for the purpose of study and report upon the salvage of Government property.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made a point of order against it, and it was necessary I should get my bill through speedily, so I was not able further to press the matter. I think it is unfortunate that there was not created at that time or at an earlier period a commission that could have made a very broad survey. Now, answering the gentleman's question directly, I do not believe that it is physically possible for the Congress of the United States to undertake to control or in any direct way to supervise the disposition of Government property that has been acquired since the war, and I say that irrespective of any view as to the desirability of it. It is perfectly manifest that if the Congress undertakes to acquaint itself with the facts that warrant a judgment—and I take it none of us would want a judgment that was not predicated upon facts—the time involved would be so great that you would lose the opportunity surrounding the disposition of much property now at advantageous terms that will not exist in the future; and while I think every department ought, of course, carefully to see to it that they get the utmost that they can for the disposition of any Government property, I am also thoroughly of the belief that as to much property, if too much stress is laid upon getting what might represent its cost value, or near that, that there will be such delay that the cost of taking care of it, storing it, inventoring it, and of the overhead machinery that the Government always piles up in connection with everything that it undertakes, will make the result anything but advantageous. Take a concrete case. Take the matter of animals. We have a good many horses and other draft animals. It was not proposed to dispose of very many of them. I personally protested to the Secretary of War about what I understood was the staff's view as to the number of horses they wanted to dispose of because it is a very patent fact, irrespective of the price you get, that the keep of a horse that was not needed is such that in a year you are out of money as compared with giving the horse away. Now, that is a direct case, and it is a case that is illustrative of many others concerning the cost of Government property.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, my question was in the best of faith, but information has come to me——

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not questioning that at all——

Mr. FESS (continuing). That indicated we were not getting the best results out of leaving it with the heads of departments.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me say another thing about that. It is very difficult to get accurate information. A story gets started which may be true as to a particular instance, but it loses nothing in the telling, and in a few weeks it is used as an illustration of a general situation without any foundation in fact. There were a number of horses sold out West in order to test the market. They sold for a very low price. I have heard repeatedly in the cloakrooms and elsewhere that we were selling all horses and mules at that price. I took occasion to inquire into it and found that it was not so. Now, I have not the time to follow these things down to get accurate information. Of course, there are going to be instances in which property will be sold at an inexcusable price. I hope they will be few, but I know what we are dealing with, and when we get into matters affecting so many people the result is that you get what might be called the run-of-the-mine, and you are going to get just that efficiency that the average of American men will give, or at least you are not going to get greater than that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. So far as the gentleman knows, has anyone had the temerity to predict what we are likely to get in cash from these salvaged properties? We should admire their courage, but that question has been asked me.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is nobody that I know of who has looked at the whole picture. Perhaps the Committee on Appropriations has had as many different angles of it presented as almost any other group of men, but gentlemen will find running through these hearings various estimates made by various individuals as to what they think might be salvaged out of the property. There was a statement made in regard to engineer equipment, some statement in regard to some railway equipment, which I think has some value, because it is made by a man who speaks with considerable knowledge.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. But there has been no effort made to total those?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not undertaken it; I do not think it will be worth the labor.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the department put an amount of complication upon the purchase of anything that makes it a pretty difficult matter to get at what you can do? For instance, I wrote to the War Department a while ago to see if I could buy a typewriter and put in my application to buy a typewriter. I did not secure it, and after waiting I finally decided I did not want it at the present time. The departments have got typewriters to sell, but the thing is so complicated that you can not go and buy one.

Mr. SHERLEY. The problem is neither new nor soluble. It is only bigger because of the big figures. It is one that has always confronted the people in connection with the Government, and that is the problem of red tape. Now, some man will frequently rail against red tape and then complain of the informal method in which some Government official has acted. Whenever the thing that is done suits him he is glad the red tape was cut; whenever it does not suit him, then he is quite sure that the man ought to be punished for disregarding the rule which is simply another way of saying the red tape of a department.

Now, we can talk for the rest of time, but it is going inevitably to follow that most of the adjustments have to be made through the agencies that created the obligations. I do not see any other possible course.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any conception of about what sum was expended for and will be realized in the sale of saddles and harness? My information was that if this war should last 10 years beyond the period of time at which the armistice was signed, and we had used every available animal in America that could be used for that purpose, that we had saddles and harness enough to have lasted for that period of time. And I was just wondering if we were going to use the same instrumentalities that purchased that harness and saddle for their disposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am neither prepared to admit nor deny the gentleman's statement as to quantities. The gentleman will find in the hearings—I can not turn to it immediately—some testimony as to the amount of money that has been expended in connection with harness, which would include saddles, by the Military Establishment. But, as I stated a while ago, it is impossible for me to come to a conclusion touching a great many statements that I hear made. Frequently they are unwarranted, and sometimes they are warranted; and there never has been a time when as much of a tax was put on real judgment as there is to-day. I think men could very easily spend a good deal of time by running down a lot of things that have no foundation in fact. On the other hand, there ought to be, and I hope will be, considerable inquiry touching matters upon which there is a reasonable basis to suppose that the statements concerning which are warranted and represent conditions that are unjustifiable.

I want to say this in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations: That committee has volunteered to do an amount of work that can not be overstated in connection with this bill, and it is not the function of that committee in the slightest degree to undertake to make itself into a court of inquiry touching various activities of the department. Whenever information came to us that seemed to warrant an inquiry we undertook to make it, but the committee could not possibly attend to its business, or one-tenth of its business, if it undertook to go into all the activities of the various departments. And that work, if it is to be done, ought to and could be done by many other committees of the House that have not the responsibility and the burden of the supply bills upon them that are upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret not having heard the first part of the gentleman's statement, having been in conference on the tax question. I am very anxious to obtain some information with regard to salvage and the repeal of appropriations. My recollection is that the appropriation bill brought in by the gentleman for war purposes for the current year carried $24,000,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's recollection is not correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We surely have made appropriations equal to $24,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1919?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. We have made more than that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the appropriations shown by the gentleman's statement to Congress totaled $24,000,000,000, and those figures were confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who said that our expenditures might exceed that amount. Subsequently a deficiency bill was brought in by the gentleman carrying $7,000,000,000 additional of appropriations, which would make for the fiscal year a total of $31,000,000,000. Am I correct as to that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman is correct in a broad, general way. He is quite incorrect in his statement as to how appropriations were made and the Committee on Appropriations making them. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that there has been appropriated for the Military Establishment since the war started, in the way of cash appropriations, $24,235,000,000. In addition to that there have been authorizations of a total of $8,521,000,000. Authorizations to the extent of $8,190,000,000 are being cancelled here, so that the gentleman can practically ignore for present purposes authorizations and deal with twenty-four billions and a quarter. Of that there have been nine billion nine hundred million and odd dollars spent as of the 1st of December.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, of course, will appreciate the importance of these questions. I am seeking information, because we started out to raise $8,000,000,000 by taxation——

Mr. SHERLEY. I think I can answer what the gentleman is after, and I stated it a while ago. In my judgment we will spend somewhere between $18,000,000,000 and $19,000,000,000 this year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This fiscal year?

Mr. SHERLEY. This fiscal year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ending June 30 next?

Mr. SHERLEY. Ending June 30 next. You gentlemen are supposed to bring in a bill that might produce in the way of internal taxation $6,000,000,000 or more, and most of the remainder would come from the proceeds of bond sales. That, in a nutshell, is my idea of the situation that confronts the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not seeking to confuse the gentleman, because he can help us. We were told to raise $8,000,000,000. We are now supposed to be content with $6,000,000,000, and it has been suggested that $4,000,000,000 would be sufficient. My proposition is one of simple arithmetic. If we have authorized to be spent $24,000,000,000 plus $7,000,000,000, making $31,000,000,000, it appears there should be a very great salvage and repeal of appropriations or more money must be raised both by taxes and by loans.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think the gentleman can approach the matter from the standpoint of moneys that have been appropriated and authorizations which have been granted. The way to approach it is figuring on what will probably be spent out of the Treasury during the fiscal year.

Now, I was hoping to give this to the House in some form and shape, instead of as the result of questions and answers, but as long as the gentleman has entered the field perhaps I can give him some of the information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman does that, merely so he can answer the whole thing at once, let me say that my understanding of the situation is that we authorized the expenditure of a total of $31,000,000,000 for this fiscal year, and the Government is certainly obligated for that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Government is not obligated necessarily by moneys that are appropriated. The Government is affected by expenditures that are made within appropriations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We stood to expend $31,000,000,000 this year.

Mr. SHERLEY. On its face we stood to spend less than that. I have not had the time to check up the actual figures. What I have tried to give the gentleman, if he will just bear with me, is a statement that for the Military Establishment since the beginning of the war there have been about twenty-four and one-quarter billion dollars appropriated. I am proposing to take back from them about $7,000,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would make a saving that would be apparent to anyone, and that is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it will induce a saving, but it will not necessarily produce a saving. The gentleman is assuming that whatever is appropriated will be expended.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we were obligated to expend, or if we appropriated $31,000,000,000, what have we to pay it with except $5,000,000,000 raised by loans this year and $4,000,000,000 that has come in by taxes, a total of $9,000,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer the gentleman in this way: I think we will have to meet this fiscal year from $18,000,000,000 to $19,000,000,000. We have raised from loans this year about $6,000,000,000. Presumably you gentlemen are going to raise by internal taxation $6,000,000,000, which makes six or seven billion dollars to be paid from the proceeds of other loans and from other sources of revenue.

Now, personally I answer the gentleman's inquiry by this statement, as I answered it within five days after the war started, and every event that has transpired since then has been an event to accentuate the wisdom of my statement; and that was that the Congress could not overtax, and would not, and that the danger all the time would be of undertaking to borrow instead of raising by taxation. And men can talk about the high cost of living until the rest of time, but until the nations of the world cease to feed into the currencies of the world their promises to pay you will not get rid of the inflation that is bothering all the world.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will see that I am trying to help him when I try to find out whether it is necessary to get along without loans or increasing taxes.

Mr. SHERLEY. My interest is in helping the gentleman in the way of the determination of taxes, because I remember that the gentleman was one of those who constantly insisted that we could pass this burden on to future generations, and ought not to tax too much.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken as to that. I stated that we were obligated to pay, and I have not yet seen how we can pay without raising some money by taxes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I remember when we discussed whether we should raise one-third or one-four by taxation, or a greater sum. The problem that confronts the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House is not how much of taxation they can get rid, but how much they can properly tax, because it is in the interest of the people of America that we should really get out of borrowing and as soon as possible go on to the basis that all sound going concerns must go on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I again say to the gentleman that he clearly misunderstood my attitude, and he evidently quotes some other gentleman of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I have, I am glad to know it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking these questions, I will say to the gentleman, because the President asked us to raise $8,000,000,000 by taxes, and as a loyal citizen and a Representative I have been trying to get that money where the President said we must get it. Now, we are told to get less, and I want to know whether by getting less we shall be able to pay the debts we have incurred. That is all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, you are not going to be able immediately to pay them by getting either the maximum or the lowest sum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have given the reason why I sought the information from the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quarreling with the gentleman. If I had not been interrupted I think I would have been able to give it in one-third of the time, and I think I have given it now three times by summary.

The expenditures that have been made so far will be an index for the balance of the year. We have expended in the first six months of the fiscal year 1919 $8,570,160,890.43 in the way of expenses other than loans to our allies. We have expended in the way of loans $2,061,986,697.70, or a total of $10,632,147,588.13. Now, if we should spend during the last six months of the fiscal year the same amount of money that we have spent during the first six months, our total expenditures would be over $21,000,000,000. But it is to my mind perfectly manifest that our loans will practically cease to our allies, and that we have reached the peak of monthly expenditure. We are spending now at the rate of about $50,000,000 a day, and, basing a judgment simply upon the testimony of various individuals in various departments touching their activities, I look to see a constant falling off in expenditures up to April, and after April a very marked falling off, because by the first or middle of April we should have cleaned up a very large part of our contract obligations, and inasmuch as we have ceased production to a very great extent the Government's expenses ought to get down more nearly toward normal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are still spending about a billion and a half a month, including our loans.

Mr. SHERLEY. We spent in December, excluding our loans, $1,670,890,000, and we have spent this month, excluding loans, according to the Treasury statement of January 27, $1,415,000,000, and, figuring $50,000,000 a day for the remaining four days, would make $200,000,000 more, or something over $1,600,000,000 for the month of January, exclusive of loans.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will concede that the total of expenditure in the 8 or 10 months we have been working on the revenue bill trying to raise $6,000,000,000 or $8,000,000,000, whichever sum may be realized, would certainly have a bearing on the amount that we are going to raise by taxes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody I ever heard of has thought we were going to pay our debts this year simply by the money we raised from taxation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In view of what the gentleman has said as to the wisdom of providing as much as possible of our expenses by taxation, considering everything, does the gentleman think it is wise now to decide upon the amount of taxes that we shall raise for the year 1920 without further information as to what our actual expenses will be in 1920?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not know that I can answer that question. My own belief—and I say it very soberly—is that the Nation for a number of years ahead of us must face very heavy taxation, and that the tendency of every legislative body the world over is to evade the very disagreeable duty of levying taxes, and that it never evades that duty by borrowing without hurting the country. The one great lesson of the Civil War, to which I took occasion to call the attention of the House when this war broke out, was that it was only at the end of that war, practically, that the Congress had the courage to tax really heavily. It kept on borrowing and borrowing and borrowing until the credit of the Government had gotten to the lowest possible ebb, and it only began to reestablish the credit of the Nation when it showed a willingness to pay.

Now, what is true of an individual is true of a nation. It is only by showing a willingness to pay that a man maintains his credit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not the argument of the gentleman an argument against the unwisdom of deciding now the total amount that we shall raise by taxation for the year 1920, when we have no idea how much our expenditures in 1920 will be?

Mr. SHERLEY. That might well be an argument against a conclusion as to the amount that ought to be raised rather than as to the attempt now to plan for it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not suppose the gentleman cares to give a guess as to what the actual expenses of this Nation will be in 1920; but without guessing very far the gentleman, I think, would concede that they will be considerably more than $4,000,000,000, would he not?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they are likely to be more than $4,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Nearer to $8,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000, does not the gentleman think?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I would not say nearer $10,000,000,000 than $4,0000,000,000, unless you gentlemen run more riot than I think you will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We will try to quell the riot to some extent.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was giving you that benefit. So I say I do not think our expenditures in 1920 will go nearer to $10,000,000,000 than to $4,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But does not the gentleman think—and he is guessing, as we all must guess—that it is the height of unwisdom now to pass a revenue law raising a given amount of money when we believe—the gentleman and I believe, at least—that that amount will not come within 50 per cent of paying the total expenses for the year 1920. In other words, would it not be better to wait until 1920 and see how much taxes ought to be raised?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman knows that I am a modest man——

Mr. LONGWORTH. All the truly great are modest.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that I have a great deal more to do than I can attend to in regard to the appropriating end. It has been a consolation to me to know that the gentleman was on the committee dealing with the taxing end. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman what amount of appropriations is repealed by this deficiency bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. The report gives it to you in detail.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not sure whether it was——

Mr. SHERLEY. Roughly speaking, over $7,000,000,000 of appropriations and over $8,000,000,000 of authorizations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that mean $15,000,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. It means of appropriations and authorizations, $15,000,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A total of $15,000,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman one more question, and then I will subside?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the gentleman's statement as to the necessity for taxation over a period of years, is he satisfied to state that we should raise $8,000,000,000 in the present taxation bill, or $6,000,000,000—$6,000,000,000 being sufficient to carry us only four months at the present rate of expenditure?

Mr. SHERLEY. Frankly, I do not think that my opinion as to the total that you can or ought to raise is of very much value. I have not undertaken to ascertain what moneys could be received from various characters of taxes. All I have tried to do was to impress upon the House a point of view, in order that men who have to deal with the details of it—like the gentleman—might approach it from what I think is the right point of view, and that is, that as far as you can you ought to use the taxing power. Now, there is a limit to that. The wealth of the Nation is not the determining factor, as some people think, as to what amount of tax can be levied. What is more nearly a determining factor is the liquid wealth of the Nation, because there are certain values that exist, and while they are real they are not of such a character that they will readily yield revenue, and you can not afford so to oppress industry that you will prevent that creation of wealth by labor of all forms that is, after all, the source from which the Government must live.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman as to that; but my question was specific as to raising eight millions or six millions at the present time, in view of the necessity stated by the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. If we can in an equitable bill raise eight billions, I would be glad to see it, rather than six. As to the detailed proposal confronting the gentleman, I am not familiar enough to base a judgment upon it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In the consideration of the bill has the gentleman any information coming to the committee in regard to the Army motor trucks on hand and the disposition of the same?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; there is published in the hearings money appropriated for motor trucks and the number they have, as far as they know. There is an inventory being made all over the country to ascertain that fact, but I have not in my memory the figures just now. The gentleman will find that in the hearings.

Now, I would like to come back to where I left off when speaking of the Quartermaster Corps. These savings grow out of the fact, as I stated, that the reduction of the Army from the maximum so as to reach down to 500,000 or even a somewhat larger figure makes possible these reductions.

In pay of the Army there has been left with the department money sufficient to pay the number of men with the colors to July 1, including a month's extra pay, in the event that that should be voted. It is rather interesting to know that a month's extra pay amounts to about $153,000,000. Of course, if that sum should be increased by action of Congress in voting two month's extra pay, it would amount to over $300,000,000, and if it was increased to six months, as suggested by some, it would be approximately $900,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would the increase of pay of the Army for an extra month include the officers?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; the increase of a month's pay in the figures I have given would include the payment of both officers and men.

The committee undertook in regard to all the various items under the Quartermaster's Department to get submitted to us a statement somewhat in detail as to the amount of money that has been appropriated, that had been allotted for a particular purpose, and the amount that had been expended. And a table was made up as of the 1st of November of the amount necessary to expend for the balance of the year. These tables were under various items, such as "Regular supplies," "Water and sewers," "Roads, walks, and drainage," and "Incidental expenses," "Army transportation," "Clothing," and "Equipment." Gentlemen will find in the hearings rather detailed information touching a lot of these matters. That information in many instances is not now current, but it was presumably current at the time the testimony was given.

As a result of the hearings we had the Quartermaster's Department take their original tables and revise them according to what developed at the hearings. The amount we took from them is in keeping with the tables as revised, and which they agreed they can surrender in connection with their appropriations. I confidently believe that there will be additional amounts that will not be expended, and ought not to be expended.

In connection with ordnance we did this. Their tables show a certain amount of appropriations and a certain amount expended as of a given date. Contract obligations of an amount stated and what they call authorizations or reserves, which differ from contract authorizations in this: A project would be approved of in the department and an estimate would be made as to what it was going to cost. There would be placed under the column of reservations so much money for this project, and if that project went into fruition and resulted in a formal contract and the undertaking of actual work, it would be taken out of the reservation column and come over into the column of obligations. But frequently matters reached a point involving third party liabilities and the doing of considerable work, and yet had not been transferred over to what are called obligations in their system of bookkeeping. They estimated in their contracts that they would have to spend 75 per cent of their face in order to relieve the Government of them. In other words, that they could cancel 25 per cent, or about that; that of their reservations they would require but 15 per cent, and they could eliminate 85 per cent. On that basis the amounts in connection with the ordnance are made up.

Manifestly, that is a simple and broad generalization, but it is a generalization predicated upon examination more or less detailed, in some matters quite so, and others very little so, by various corps, as to what they felt they could relieve the Government of and what they could not. My own judgment is that it is a very conservative statement, that they ought to be able to relieve the Government of 45 or 50 per cent of contract obligations rather than 25, but the committee did not feel that it would be warranted in putting its own judgment about he matter against the statement of these officials. We did not want to put the Government in the situation where it was not able to pay its bills. It ought to be able in settling contracts to have the money to pay them. One of the best ways of settling them would be for the Government to be in a position to pay the actual sum agreed to and not leave it to a matter for future appropriation.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. In the consideration of this question, these contracts that were canceled and authorized, are they considered under the head of authorizations and appropriations?

Mr. SHERLEY. They were not considered under either necessarily.

Mr. DENISON. Did the committee take into consideration on this coming back into the Treasury, or the cancellation of authorizations, the amount the Government would have to spend in settling these canceled contracts?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course.

Mr. DENISON. How much did the committee estimate that would require?

Mr. SHERLEY. I just stated that, as to the ordnance people, they stated that they needed 75 per cent of the face of their obligations. If the gentleman will examine the various financial sheets printed, he will catch it readily. What was done is that they presented a table of the amount of cash they have been authorized to spend.

It would be well just to forget the authorizations because we have practically wiped out all of the authorizations, and what we did not wipe out have been taken care of by appropriations which have been made, converting them from authorizations into appropriations. They had so much cash, they had spent so much as of a given date, and that left them a balance of so much. Against that balance were obligations of such amount and reservations as I have spoken of. Those obligations and reservations frequently represented a sum very greatly in excess of the available cash left, but when you cut 25 per cent of the contract obligation off and 85 per cent of the reservation off it left an amount considerably under the cash that was available. That amount taken from the cash available left the amount of appropriation that we could repeal, except as a corps might need additional moneys for the balance of the fiscal year, and when that was taken away it gave you the net which we carry in this bill. In regard to the ordnance it represents, as also the quartermaster, practically their revised statements by which they are willing to stand.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know whether the contracts for motor trucks have been canceled, or are some firms still making them for the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will find a statement about that made by Gen. Wood. They have canceled a great many of them, and Gen. Wood stated that they were not going to manufacture any that had not been begun; that only where the work had progressed to a certain extent that it would require completion did the quartermaster propose to continue, and that they had suggested to the ordnance people that they also shut down on all such work, and the ordnance people have testified generaly that they are going forward with no work where the physical conditions of the work do not make it advisable in their judgment to complete a thing rather than to scrap something that scrapped would have no value whatever. Gen. Wood also testified that the automobile people had kicked a good deal against the curtailment of their orders, but that that was their policy, and as fast as they could relieve the Government they were going to do it.

Mr. SNELL. Are not these trucks standard, so that parts could be used in the regular manufacture of heavy trucks?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, they could be, except for an attitude of mind of the American people and the American manufacturers. The average American manufacturer wants to make his particular design, and then he will spend a good part of his money in advertising to convince the people that that particular design is the desirable one. Out of that comes a good deal of the wonderful progress this country has shown in the way of betterment of things, but out of it comes also the scrapping of a great deal that is valuable but which people are led to believe is not just what they need or want.

Mr. SNELL. The last inventory I see here of trucks, and so forth, was made November 25. Does the gentleman know whether there has been a later one than this?

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand they are daily at work in regard to checking up; that there have been a number of officers sent out over the camps and cantonments. There were various corps that did buying to supply their own needs, and an effort has been made to assemble gradually all of the trucks under the Motor Truck Division, but out in the camps and cantonments there are a good number of trucks and automobiles of which they have not here a complete inventory, and they are undertaking to get that now.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know whether it is the fact that there are 9,000 over here near Baltimore in a field?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not.

Mr. SNELL. I have been informed that is so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know that there are a great many more trucks than the Government has any possible need for.

Mr. SNELL. I heard a man make that statement yesterday.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that the truck manufacturers have been very insistent that the Government should not sell trucks in large quantities, because it would smash their market. That is just one of the problems that confronts the Government right along.

Mr. SNELL. I heard this statement made the other day by a gentleman who was not talking to me, or rather I overheard it, and I do not think that he knew that I was a Congressman. He said they had just been to Washington—the truck manufacturers—and they had fixed up their matters and were going to manufacture trucks for the Government until about the 30th of June. He said that the thousands of them that were in France would be scrapped over there and never returned to this country, and also that there were 9,000 at the present time stored out here near Baltimore in a field.

Mr. SHERLEY. All I can say in response to the gentleman is that I have no other information than that which is contained in the hearings. To my mind it would be absolutely inexcusable for the Government to go into the manufacture of additional trucks except as manufacture may mean the finishing of work that has already gone to such an extent that not to finish it would be more wasteful in that you would get nothing of value and would get less salvage than if you finished it.

Mr. SNELL. With so common an article as a motor truck, it would seem to the average man that you could stop manufacture of it inside of seven months after the armistice was signed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should be very much surprised if it developed that the truck manufacturers were to carry on any governmental manufacture on a large scale for a period as late as that.

Mr. SNELL. That is the way it impressed me, and I was wondering if the Committee on Appropriations had any definite opinion along this line. There is nothing in this; I have looked through it and it does not give definite information.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will notice in reference to the Quartermaster's Department we had that hearing first.

Mr. SNELL. I notice, two months ago.

Mr. SHERLEY. And a good deal of time has passed since then working as fast as we could and I have not been informed of any such situation as the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is a matter that is worthy of attention.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman can easily verify that and very quickly, and the way to verify it is to call up either the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, or the Traffic and Storage people, who ought to be able to give definite information touching that.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. DENISON. Does the War Department have absolute and unlimited authority in the question of salvage?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, it has the authority contained in the statute which I read a while ago to the committee.

Mr. DENISON. I happened to be out of the Chamber at the moment.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is pretty broad authority.

Mr. DENISON. I asked the gentleman the question because I noticed in to-day's paper the Quartermaster's Department were selling something like a thousand mules over here in Baltimore, and I could not understand why they would sell those mules at Camp Meade in Baltimore.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know whether Baltimore is a mule market, but I suspect that the reason that controlled them was that the transportation to another market would be sufficiently heavy as to be unjustifiable, and personally, while I think they ought to get all for the mules they can, yet every mule and horse that the Government sells the Government is the gainer thereby.

Mr. DENISON. I think that is true; but in this case I think it was bad judgment, because everyone who knows anything about the mule market—the stock market—knows that mules are bought in this country largely in the Northern States and shipped into the Southern States, where the principal mule market is, and those mules that were sold at Camp Meade will be bought by speculators, put on a train and shipped to the cotton States, and sold at a great big profit, and I think that is what the Government ought to have done with them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quite sure the Government ought to do it.

Mr. DENISON. If they wanted to get real salvage.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not so sure of that. Theoretically that works out very well, but by the time you got the Government organization following the mules down with the overhead it more than eats up what you get as an additional price. I am anxious that the Government should get out of business. I do not believe that we are going to gain very greatly by assuming that the Government can run a thing with the close economy that a man who is in that particular business alone can. I suspect if we could follow the bookkeeping, which you never can, we would find that by the time we paid for everything, including the men kept in the service because of this, that you would make a poor bargain in having the military organization take mules down South and sell them rather than sell them here. Now, I do not know much about it. I have never been a mule trader.

Mr. SNELL. I entirely agree with the gentleman's statement, and I am glad to hear him make the statement that it is a good time for the Government to get out of business.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. HARDY. That is in reference to Government manufacture. Is it the policy of the department always to discontinue the manufacture of such articles as the Government will have no need for itself, to stop the completion of the matter?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not know that you could answer that by saying yes or no. The Government might have a building with four walls up and no roof on it and with no use on earth for the building, and yet it would be wise to turn in and put a roof on it as a means of salvaging that place.

Mr. HARDY. The illustration the gentleman makes is all right, but take a certain war material, for instance, for which, now that peace has come, we have no need. Is it the policy ever to finish any of those or are they cut off?

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I have never been particularly concerned with the agitation that has gone around as to the condition in connection with unemployment that we were facing. I believe if the Government will take its hand off the citizen wherever it is possible and leave him to go back to his old method of self-reliance, the industry of the country will largely take care of the labor situation and all other situations.

Mr. HARDY. In which I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. But it is also perfectly manifest you can not stop everything overnight without playing smash. It is a question of judgment, and it is a question of judgment as to the particular cases. The testimony repeatedly given again and again and again by these officers was that they were trying to the utmost degree to slow down and to eliminate the manufacture of things that were not desired, and they cited only four instances in which the labor situation had determined a policy to continue manufacture for a limited length of time. I do not recall the four cities, but they were named. And I do not happen to have knowledge enough to qualify as to whether a given thing should be done or not done in most instances.

Mr. HARDY. What had occurred to me was that rather than to use up raw material it would not be better to pay the wages and stop the work and save the material at the same time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I doubt if there are many cases where you have raw material in that condition. What you have is usually raw material in the sense that one man uses it, but a finished material in another sense and cut in such shape as to be available only for the purposes intended by the Government, and it becomes scrap and junk if you do not use it in that way. It all depends on what the article is and the conditions that surround it. And I know of no way in which to lay down a hard and fast rule.

The gentleman will appreciate that there are a great many factors that enter into a thing of that kind. It is very hard, of course, to convince military men that they are not going to have need of some sort for war material, although we have such quantities now. I do not think that factor is playing any considerable part, but here is a thing that is 80 or 90 per cent completed——

Mr. HARDY. That is the very point.

Mr. SHERLEY. Wait a moment. It may be 80 or 90 per cent completed, not in the way of finished but in a way of obligation that has been incurred. Now, it might be desirable to spend 10 per cent more and get a 155-millimeter gun, for instance, than to scrap it and lose the whole out of an unwillingness to spend that 10 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. If you do not have any use for the millimeter gun when completed, does not the gentleman's argument fall to the ground and should we not stop and save the 10 per cent?

Mr. SHERLEY. My own judgment is that we should stop everything we can, but we are not free agents, however, as we have a great many obligations which we have to carry through. Now, another thing. You can not put a sudden stop to the country's wheels without having a good deal of damage done..

If the committee please, I have wandered very far afield and have not been able to make, as I had hoped, anything like a connected statement; but I want to make a statement touching a situation that came about through the Navy estimates that were submitted to Congress. The Navy has had appropriations, including a three-year building program previously authorized, of $3,376,956,000. They had disbursed as of November 1, $1,568,710,000, which left a cash balance of $1,808,245,000. They came in and asked for a deficiency appropriation of $419,294,526. They made an estimate of moneys that they would not need and which they could surrender of $274,407,641, or a net deficiency of $144,886,884. The committee spent two or three pretty hard weeks with the Navy. We could not understand a situation that would require us at this time to make a net deficiency appropriation of $144,000,000. The result of the hearings was such that we recommend to repeal $334,361,866 which they do not need to spend and that the deficiencies which they need, instead of being $419,294,526, are cut to $280,762,225, so that the bill recommends a net saving on Navy appropriations of $53,599,641 instead of a net deficiency that they estimated when they originally came before the committee of $144,886,884.

Now, I notice in the recent hearings before the Naval Committee that the distinguished Secretary of the Navy suggested that one of his difficulties had been that he had to go to the Committee on Appropriations for a number of matters and that they were not familiar with naval matters, and that that made it difficult for the committee and for himself. I desire only to say in response that the committee may not be familiar with the details of naval matters, but it believes that it is somewhat familiar with financial statements, and it submits as a fact of its familiarity, for the benefit of the Treasury, a difference of getting back $53,000,000 instead of giving up an additional $144,000,000. But it might also suggest that usually the committee's knowledge of naval affairs was not involved, because we were presented with deficiencies that had been incurred without the authorization either from the Naval Affairs Committee or any other committee of Congress, and the only thing we could do was to pay the bills.

I recall that the Committee on Naval Affairs voted $215,000,000 for a Navy emergency fund in connection largely with the building of torpedo-boat destroyers and what are known as chasers. The Committee on Appropriations, at the insistence of the Navy Department, added to that sum $100,000,000, making a total of $315,000,000. The Navy Department overobligated that fund by $96,000,000, embracing activities of every known description, practically, in connection with the Navy Department, and the Committee on Appropriations and the Naval Affairs Committee of the House were met with a situation where $315,000,000 had been voted for an emergency fund and obligations considerably over $400,000,000 incurred. And one of the deficiencies that we carry in this bill is $33,000,000 for the completion of destroyers that were undertaken in connection with this naval emergency fund.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that include the "Eagle" boats that are being made in Detroit?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; that $33,000,000 does not. But, of course, a great deal of this money from this emergency fund did go for "Eagle" boats, but it was available for any purpose in the prosecution of the war that they thought necessary to expend it for. By expending it for one purpose they left just that much less to be expended for another purpose.

It is also true in connection with the cantonments that the Navy built that practically all of them were built without any direct appropriation having been made for them, and then the bills presented in the form of deficiencies.

Now, I am not altogether quarreling about some of that, because the exigencies that confronted the Navy were great. All of us take a pride in their achievements and accomplishments, and they have had estimates that were predicated, as I stated awhile ago, on a Navy of very much less size than what it developed into. When the war broke they had 300 ships in commission. When the war ended they had 2,003 ships in commission. That meant a tremendous expansion, and it meant that they had to do a great many things and come to us afterwards. But in view of those facts it seems to me that there was hardly much excuse for the Secretary's apparent regret that the Committee on Appropriations was not familiar with naval affairs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The question that came to my mind in that connection was how would the Secretary of the Navy know that the Committee on Appropriations is not acquainted with naval affairs? I did not know that he knew enough about the Navy to qualify as a judge whether anybody else knew anything about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I am not prepared to adopt that statement in regard to the matter, but I think it is due to the Committee on Appropriations to say that when they do not know they try to learn, and when they fail to learn it is usually because they are unable to obtain information that would give them the knowledge by which they would know.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, you have difficulty in getting information from those who are supposed to have it?

Mr. SHERLEY. That frequently is the situation. But we have very carefully gone over the Navy matters this time, and we are prepared to defend the action which we have taken.

Now, gentlemen, this, I believe, has resulted from the committee's labors: In the first place, if our action meets the approval of the Congress, we will have taken away the possibility of expenditure in the amounts which I have indicated. It may be answered by some that the departments would not have spent these sums anyway. That may or may not be accurate. But when you take it away, you remove any doubt. But over and beyond all that, the value of the committee's work has been this: That for the first time in many, many years the departments have been required to throw into a financial sheet a statement of the moneys that have been given to them, and the moneys that have been expended, and the moneys that were available; and officer after officer has stated that the examinations which they have been compelled to undertake have brought about a knowledge, a clarity of vision, as to their situation and problems that they probably would not have obtained otherwise in many, many months. I am satisfied that as a result of this examination there can be savings running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars. And I can not overemphasize the importance of saving to this country at this time. I think the American people are going to demand of the Congress and of administrative officers the elimination of all those things that can be eliminated without real hurt to the people of America.

Now, it is difficult to say as to many matters that are on the borderland as to whether they ought or ought not to be carried forward, but the doubt ought always to be resolved in favor of the Treasury, and in favor of not doing, rather than in favor of doing.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Work on my committee has compelled my absence during a good part of the gentleman's remarks. Has he explained in regard to those things, both in the Army and in the Navy, that have arrived at a partial state of completion—those things that we must have hereafter? Are such things going on to completion, or will there be a large amount of contracts canceled or authorizations revoked of matters already in a state of partial completion?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have made two or three general statements from time to time. Touching the ordnance, they will have—with the exception of a very few things, either delivered or necessary to be completed and delivered, because of the inability to relieve the Government of its contract obligations—as a reserve more than a sufficient quantity for 48 divisions of the Army, which they figured was the number of divisions they wanted a reserve for. The gentleman will find in the hearings tables undertaking to set out in detail the number of guns and the number of howitzers of various sizes and kinds that they will have, the number that their tables of organization make it desirable for them to have for 48 divisions, whether that number represents a plus or minus, and to what extent; the number of shells of various calibers they will have; and so forth. Now, the problem, practically, is not a problem of getting something that you should have, but of getting rid of obligations for things that you have already got in quantities sufficient; and in practically every instance the Government ought to measure its cancellations by its ability to cancel.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In taking back the appropriations which the committee recommends to be taken back, will it be necessary, as the result of that, to reappropriate the amount that will be found to be due when the contracts are adjusted?

Mr. SHERLEY. In my opinion there is not a single instance where we have taken moneys away in such quantity as not to leave a balance that ought to be amply sufficient to take care of the department's needs in meeting its obligations and its necessities for the balance of the fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not exactly what I said.

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean obligations and contracts.

Mr. MADDEN. I mean readjustments.

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean that, too. I mean it ought to be able to pay its debts and maintain itself until July 1 on the moneys that are left.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to submit this statement to the gentleman: The Ordnance Department was before our committee the other day and asked for an amount of money to continue the manufacture of the Springfield rifle, as it was intended that that should be our rifle hereafter, and asked that we should continue the manufacture of that rifle, not in large, maximum capacity at all, but that we should continue the manufacture of that rifle. At the same time we know that a number of rifles and rifle barrels have reached a stage of completion where it will be almost a dead loss if they are not completed. Query: Is it provided in the gentleman's bill that contracts like that shall be canceled, stopping the manufacture of rifle barrels, for instance, where the manufacture is already proceeding, junking the rifle barrels, and then in the Army bill this year or next year provide for buying those very same rifles?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; we do not undertake to compel action in any given instance. Take the illustration. They have so many rifle contracts. They estimate that they can relieve themselves of a certain quantity, and that they will have to accept the balance. They have a table as to the number of rifles of the modified Enfield pattern which they expect to get under this program. The same applies to other ordnance material. Now, pooling it all they figure that they can relieve the Government of 25 per cent of the face of their contract obligations. My own judgment is, as I have stated before, that they can relieve the Government of considerably more than that. We have the same problem before the committee in connection with the fortification bill, and it is my opinion that as to any new appropriations that are being asked for in connection with particular projects, assuming that the Congress agrees to those projects, we could safely pay for them out of existing moneys that they have, which will remain available in some cases until expended; and I hope in connection with the fortification bill that a provision will be carried covering into the Treasury all unexpended balances as of the end of 1920, so as to prevent having for many years hereafter sums that we do not know about at the disposition of the department.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the questions which have been asked I would like to call attention to a particular item, which is like many other similar items. On page 21 is this item:

For horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, etc., fiscal years 1917–18 and 1918, $32,170,956.08.

First, I would like to inquire what is meant by the "fiscal year 1917–18"?

Mr. SHERLEY. Funds were made available by legislation from one fiscal year over to another, and they were thrown together in the Treasury accounts as of one fund, so that the appropriations were appropriations made both in 1917 and in 1918, and these are actual incurred deficiencies that exist, for which there are no moneys now available to pay them.

Mr. MANN. These are not deficiencies. These are sums covered back into the surplus fund of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is right. I looked at the page in regard to the Navy and thought it was in regard to the Army.

Mr. MANN. That apparently is a balance?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does that mean that all the accounts for 1918 are settled, or is there liable to be a further deficiency to be taken care of in the future for the accounts of 1918 under this particular item?

Mr. SHERLEY. There will probably be some items that will still come in for those fiscal years, but this does not mean that we have taken all the money that they had from those years, but that we simply have taken that amount that they feel certain they can give up as not being needed to meet any bills or obligations incurred in those fiscal years.

Mr. MANN. You are getting it down to a pretty fine point—8 cents in an item of $32,000,000. Of course, I know how those things come.

Mr. SHERLEY. Those items of odd cents come by taking certain items of balances.

Mr. MANN. I know how they come; but I did not know whether that was a complete balance. There is nothing to indicate whether it is a whole or a part balance.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not a complete balance, but it is an amount in connection with certain things for which they will not have to make an expenditure, and therefore give it up. It is predicated upon that basis. I would have to look at the hearings for that particular item.

Mr. MANN. I am not inquiring about particular items.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, in connection with the deficiencies that are in the bill, most of them of any magnitude relate to the Navy, and I shall be glad, when any of them are reached, to give to the Committee of the Whole any information that I may have touching the reason for them.

The deficiencies that relate to the War Department amount to $6,400,000. Of that sum, $4,000,000 is in regard to the temporary clerks in the War Department. They estimated a need of $6,000,000 additional, and I am just in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War urging that we give the $6,000,000 additional. That is because of the relief from clerical work of a lot of men in the service, so that the temporary employees will have to be maintained at a considerable number, though not at the number that they reached at their maximum a few months back; and he says that their present pay roll, unless very severely reduced, will not enable them to get through on the $4,000,000 that we here appropriate, and that they need the $6,000,000 that they asked for. I do not know how you can come to any real conclusion touching these matters. The Adjutant General's Office comes and urges a tremendous increase in force, stating that it is behind in a lot of its work—and we all know that—and that a great deal of additional work will come upon that office because of the work that will be thrown upon it as the result of the draft and the bringing in and classifying of those records; and that as the men go out of the service the work that is thrown upon that office is very greatly increased.

There is a good deal of truth in what they say. It is also true that the finance division in the near future claims that it needs a greater force than they needed at any other time, but there seems to be a general belief on the part of the House that there is a lot of unnecessary clerks being employed. The Committee on Appropriations has never given all the clerks that were asked in the various departments. We have tried to hold them down. One man does more work with 100 clerks than another will do with 150 clerks. The committee can not undertake to come to any hard and fast conclusions as to the numbers they need. We want to put pressure on the departments to hold down the clerical force and produce efficiency in them, instead of coming to Congress and asking for additional employees on the plea that the work is behind. If I felt that the work could be made current by giving in its entirety the amount they ask in the way of clerical hire, I would be glad to do it, because it would be money well spent in order to get the work current and get things accomplished, but I have been forced to the conclusion that efficiency of output does not bear always a direct relationship to the number of employees, but frequently in inverse ratio. What is needed is not so many additional clerks as a proper supervision of clerks and elimination of doing unnecessary things. We have infinitely too many forms in the Government. We have requirements in connection with paper that have not any basis of reason for them and that could be eliminated without in the slightest degree lessening the safeguards to the Government and would result in a very great deal of saving. It is just one of those perpetual problems that every Government has, and I know of no solution except through the individual who happens to be charged with the responsibility of the work.

Now, there is a deficiency of $2,473,782 for the disposition of remains of officers and soldiers and civilian employees. While the language does not hold the appropriation to the men who died here in America, the deficiency is for the expense incident to the burial of men who died in America and does not result from any expense that may arise in the return of the bodies of men who die overseas, if that policy should be entered upon.

The epidemic of influenza which swept over this country caused in the Army, as in civil life, a great increase in deaths. The result was that funds available for this purpose were not sufficient to carry them through the balance of the fiscal year, and the estimate was made which we allowed in its entirety. It is a more or less fixed expenditure, and the total is dependent on the deaths that take place in the service.

The other items, except the Navy, are minor ones in connection with the various departments of the Government, the District of Columbia, and Employees' Compensation Commission, the Treasury Department, and so forth. Under the five-minute rule if anyone desires information touching any one of them I will be glad to supply it if possible.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I gathered from reading the hearings that a request was made of the subcommittee on behalf of the Tariff Commission, for an increase of appropriation in order to carry out certain projects that they have under contemplation. Will the gentleman state whether that request was given careful consideration and what induced the committee to refuse to allow the increase?

Mr. SHERLEY. That request, like all requests, was given careful consideration. It was the judgment of the committee that at this time it was not particularly desirable or necessary for the Tariff Commission to increase its activities; that in a great many areas conditions were so unsettled as to make any study proposed of little value in coming to a permanent conclusion. The gentleman will recall that the law creating the Tariff Commission provided for a maximum expenditure of $300,000. We have appropriated this year $200,000, and their estimate was for $100,000 more. It would have meant, if given, that for the last six months they would be running at a rate of expenditure in excess of what the law authorized. They have very carefully and very scrupulously observed the limitation upon their funds. They so allotted their work that they spent during the first six months just half of their fund. If they were given the additional $100,000 it would have meant for the last six months an expenditure at the rate of $400,000 a year. There was some difference of opinion on the part of the members of the subcommittee as to whether they should be given any additional sum or not, but the result of the majority opinion was—and by majority I do not mean a political majority necessarily—that there was no need of an appropriation at this time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the committee think of giving them an appropriation which would have gone as high as $50,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. Fifty thousand dollars? That was suggested by one member of the subcommittee, but did not meet with the concurrence of other members.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand the situation, it is this: The act creating the Tariff Commission was passed in 1916 and authorized an appropriation of $300,000, but, as a matter of fact, in the first year, necessarily not being able to perfect the organization, something less than $200,000 was spent. The next year, on account of the war activities and otherwise, they naturally would not go ahead, and so a little less than $200,000 was spent. For the first half of this year $100,000 was spent. Now, as I understand their request, it was that, in view of the fact that an armistice had been entered into and members and employees returned who had been in the war, they felt that they could broaden the sphere of their activities, and therefore asked for a larger amount, an amount, though, in excess of the amount authorized.

It occurs to me that under the circumstances it might be wise to appropriate up to but not in excess of the amount authorized by law which created the commission, and that was my purpose in asking the gentleman whether it had been seriously considered that they be given the amount they were authorized to expend in the original act.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will appreciate that in presenting the bill I speak for the committee and not for myself. The committee did not feel warranted at this time in appropriating additional moneys for the Tariff Board, but the matter was considered, and the very suggestion that the gentleman makes was made by one member of the subcommittee. The judgment of the subcommittee, however, which was acquiesced in by the full committee, though I do not know that the full committee's attention was particularly drawn to the matter, was that at this time no additional moneys should be appropriated. I will say to the gentleman that there is pending in connection with the sundry civil appropriation bill an estimate, I think, for $400,000 for the next fiscal year for the Tariff Commission, and I think this ought to be said in regard to the commission, that whatever views may be held as to the desirability of a commission or as to the efficiency of the work of any particular commission, this commission scrupulously kept faith with Congress touching expenditures. As I have already indicated, having received $200,000 for this year, they very carefully refrained from spending more than $100,000 the first six months. They frankly said that if Congress did not vote them the additional amount of money they would try to live within their present appropriation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, then, he says that even if this money were not given this year, and while their functions would be necessarily limited for the next fiscal year, beginning on the 1st of next July, the committee has under consideration the question of even increasing the amount authorized?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not put it that way. I meant to convey simply the fact that the commission in submitting an estimate for the next fiscal year submitted one for $400,000, and the committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, where it would be carried, has not functioned on that at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would be carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. If carried at all, it would be there. Unless some member of the committee desires to ask something touching some matter I have overlooked, I shall not longer detain the committee, but will endeavor in a revision of my remarks to bring them into some sort of coherence and to amplify the matters I have overlooked. The work that is presented here must in a very large measure be accepted somewhat on faith by the Committee of the Whole. I realize that the hearings and the matters that they deal with are so great as to make difficult any ascertainment touching many matters reported on in the bill, but there is nothing here contained that is not conceded, not always in the first instance, but conceded as a result of examination by the various departments affected to be proper, and, in my judgment, this proposed enactment can not in the slightest degree hamper the Government in going forward in the settlement of its debts and in maintaining the various corps of the Army and Navy for the balance of the fiscal year. If we have erred, we have erred on the side of conservatism, and I wish, in conclusion, to again express the hope that these sums which we are now taking back shall not by any means represent the total saving of amounts heretofore appropriated or authorized, but that the departments in working out the settlement of their obligations and by the curtailment of their activities may save sums of very great amount. I hesitate to suggest the amount, but I can not but believe that if a determination to forego the doing of everything that is not strictly necessary is followed and good business judgment is used in the adjustment of contracts the amount here carried can be augmented by a very considerable sum.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman if in considering the amounts left in the War and Navy Departments the amount is sufficient to cover the $1,600,000,000 of unsettled contracts that we passed the legalizing act for recently?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at their face.

Mr. SNYDER. But sufficient to recover what your committee considers will be a fair adjustment of these amounts?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. Not only will that be so, but as I said a moment ago I think they will be more than sufficient.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not recall hearing the gentleman state in his argument that it covered that particular thing.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I did not directly state it I did by inference, because I stated in regard to the Ordnance Department that they were surrendering 25 per cent of the face of their obligations, and I think they ought to be able to make adjustments on a bigger scale. The Quartermaster's Corps, in connection with cotton goods and other matters, have made settlements that will represent more than 25 per cent of saving on the face of their contracts. All the departments presented estimates as to the extent they would be able to cancel contracts and relieve the Government of obligations, and the amounts left with them they concede as sufficient to meet the obligations that can not be canceled and also their future needs to July 1. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith tables showing the sums appropriated, expended, and amounts stated as no longer needed for the various divisions of the Military and Naval Establishments. An examination of these will make plain many matters I was unable to deal with in addressing the House. Following these tables is appended a statement showing the cancellations of appropriations and authorizations recommended by the committee.

Statement of military appropriations made since May 12, 1917, as of Dec. 1, 1918.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee very long, but to say just a word or two in passing. First, I would like to say that the appropriation bill under consideration is unique in one respect, the main respect probably, in the cancellation of appropriations and authorizations heretofore made, a natural thing, however, to be expected from the Committee on Appropriations. Really it is a wonderful committee. I think I could readily include the other members on the subcommittee on deficiencies in congratulatory remarks that I might make, but I desire to say that two of the gentlemen upon that subcommittee, the chairman, Mr. SHERLEY, and the ranking Republican, my colleague, Uncle JOE, I regard as the best posted men to-day in public life upon the subject of appropriations and retrenchments. We are going to lose one of them in the next House. Of course, the gentleman who succeeds the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is a Republican, and I welcome him to the Republican majority in the next House, but the country will miss and the House will miss the experienced and valued services of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. [Applause.] As for the other distinguished gentleman whom I have named, I shall not be here when the time comes for him to quit, because I shall not live that long. He will remain as long as God continues to put the fire of enthusiasm into his soul and heart. [Applause.]

Having said that in passing, I want to say something that is not so sweet. I have a letter in my hand from a skilled workman, whom I have personally known for many years, and whom I have always found to be capable and bright and honest.

This is from Sheffield, Ala.:

> We have been working here at nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala., since June 12, 1918. The waste of money here has been unbelievable. Hope Congress will investigate and fix blame. Some one ought to be shot as an example.

I do not know what the Republicans in the next Congress will do, but if they do not investigate some of the charges which are made about the extravagant waste of money, especially by those not so much directly concerned with the direction of the war, and ascertain whether the charges are true or false, and if they are true to punish some of the people connected with the robbery of the Government, they will have failed in performing a function, one reason for which gave them power. Now, I have got another grouch. I read an advertisement which recently appeared in some of the papers of the country. Here it is:

The ——— Service offers to men in good standing an opportunity to go into business for themselves backed by a large manufacturing concern whose products are in great demand among farmers. You can earn from $2,000 to $5,000 per year, provided you can furnish two responsible bondsmen and a team or an auto. No other investment necessary. Men are now earning this income.

That sounds like a get-rich-quick advertisement published by an ordinary advertiser, and most people would assume that somebody was intended to be stung by the advertiser and to be bled properly. But, who issues this advertisement, this $5,000 per year for a man with no means to sell products to the poor farmers of the country, intending to beat them? Who issues this advertisement? The Government of the United States! This advertisement is issued by the United States Employment Service, signed "Address Frank A. Weaver, United States Employment Service, Minneapolis, Minn." Now, I can appreciate the desire and perhaps the need for the Government, through some service of the Government, to attempt to take care of unemployed labor, but I can not understand why the Government should pay the cost of an advertisement which anybody can get up designed to beat some one. Of course, this concern may be a reputable concern. I do not know, but it has some new product that it thinks it can work off on the poor farmer or the good rich farmers—they are all rich now, I believe, according to some stories—and then, instead of paying the expenses of trying to do this, they want the Government of the United States to pay the expense. I believe there is no item in this deficiency appropriation bill to cover this sort of a scheme.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The bureau of which the gentleman speaks gets its funds out of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MANN. I know.

Mr. SHERLEY. I had hoped in connection with this bill to find out what the balances were with the Labor Department, the Food and Fuel Departments, but it was not possible to do it and get the bill in, but I hope to be able to do it in connection with the sundry civil bill, and to cover back in the sundry civil bill a lot of moneys that presumably will not be needed for the balance of this fiscal year for a lot of these bureaus.

Mr. MANN. Well, certainly we do not need the money appropriated by this bureau to issue this kind of an advertisement. In the first place, such advertisements might properly be barred from publication and issuance through the post office by anybody, but for the Government of the United States, on the theory that it is trying to secure employment for those out of employment, to try to tell men how they can earn $5,000 a year by taking hold of some new patent and selling it at an outrageous price to people out in the rural districts—it would be just as bad and perhaps more effective if it were among the rich people in the city districts, because usually they are easier taken in than the others—I protest against the gross extravagance of a Government or a governmental agency that indulges in this kind of waste of money. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to consume much time in general debate upon this bill. Under the five-minute rule I may or may not take some time, according to certain conditions; but I want to say that I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman who reports this bill, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SHERLEY], and I may state I agree with the remarks of the gentleman, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], touching his ability, his industry, and his fidelity to the public service. [Applause.] But I do not mean I trot at all in his class. I used to think in normal times, having been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for 24 years—its chairman during the War with Spain and for some time after that; I think for 14 years altogether—that I knew something touching the merits of proposed appropriations. I want to say, while I am not an idle man, while I have grown older and do not claim to have that same industry and same capacity physically or mentally I had in former years, yet I have done the best I could in the performance of my duties as a member of the committee, and I am just delighted that I was associated with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], because he has far greater ability, far greater industry, clothed with less of age than I have, and I grew very soon to repose confidence in him, kept the best track of this bill I could, and I still retain that confidence. So much for that.

The administration has the power, as has been stated, to cancel contracts, and it has been pretty busily engaged in their cancellation. There are many legal contracts, and I believe we passed a bill to legalize contracts that were made in good faith but were not legally executed. I think that legislation has not yet been enacted. I believe it is pending in the Senate, if I am not mistaken. I hope it will be considered and enacted, because I have no doubt that many of these contracts that were made verbally or by wire or without legal formalities were made in good faith by the Government on the one hand and the contractor on the other hand.

It is a wonderful responsibility that the administration has, in the cancellation of contracts and where they are canceled, in adjusting the damages that result from their cancellation. If it is vigorously and wisely done, the sooner it is done the better. Otherwise legislation will linger in Congress after Congress until we are all dead and gone. If I recollect, in the adjustment of the French spoliation claims and many other claims almost as ancient substantially a century passed before claims of that kind were adjusted by the Congress. The Government stands to lose and the individual citizen of the Government stands to lose where adjustments are not made as promptly as possible.

Now, I have no doubt that in some of these adjustments and cancellations there will be a want of knowledge upon the part of the Government or the agents of the Government. But that is no reason why an adjustment should not be made. Perchance, once in a while—and, God knows; I do not, and I could not specify anybody or any bureau or any department—there may be carelessness, there may be dishonesty here or there; but as one Member of Congress I want to give notice now that this Congress, I think, is wide awake, and I am quite sure the next will be and I am more sure that the next one will be, and that the light will be turned on if there have been abuses. Anathema maranatha to the man that undertakes to deal with important matters who is not competent or does not act in good faith!

Now, in the Lord's Prayer the sentence that always appealed to me stronger than any other is, "Lead us not into temptation," because if you are not led into temptation to do improper things you will get along very well. Oh, the weaknesses of human nature are many, and with over 100,000,000 of people there are a per cent of us who are weak. Now, that standpoint forms an additional reason why I stood for the enactment of this bill. It only deals with the Army and Navy appropriations and authorizations. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has well said that that is as far as we could go. He hopes to go further still when the sundry civil bill is reported, and I think there is plenty of room when you come to investigate matters outside of the Army and Navy appropriations and authorizations in which we can run and glorify and legislate to a good advantage. And I should not wonder, inasmuch as this Congress comes to an end on the 4th day of March next, if the next Congress that is organized will have much of investigation to do, though not from a political standpoint. Oh, I would not harm a dog; I would not harm the weakest or the strongest of the human race or anything in all animal creation just for the mere matter of harming. But this Congress, and the next Congress, and the next Congress, and the next Congress; this administration, and the next administration, and the next administration will have greatly more important work in comparison with what we have had in the past for legislation, for economy, for cleaning house, for unscrambling the eggs and getting back to a normal condition where the American citizen under the Constitution, rich or poor, great or small, will receive protection equally under that Constitution. And then you will come back again to normal times, where you will have legislation as we have had heretofore, where you will have the competition, where each unit from the standpoint of selfishness, to support himself and support the family and the hearthstone, will do the best he can to perform his duty. And then you will get the best of service.

You may ask if I am abusing anybody. No. I could criticize some people in the United States, but I am not going to do it by name. You could not have a worse condition than has come with this war condition. Wars are demoralizing. They must come and have come during the history of the human race. There is an old maxim that reaches away back a thousand or two thousand years, to the effect that "in war laws are silent." And that is true.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he leaves that?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A good many Members of the House have heard this statement about investigations and exposures. What do you expect to gain by it? What advantage will there be, when the thing is done, in making any investigations, and even suggest that there is nothing to it except to discredit our Government in the eyes of the world? I should like to have a man of the distinction of the gentleman on his feet now make answer to that general statement that we hear so often.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I can not specify, although "I hae me doots" about many things that have been done. I am charitable and can make allowance for things that have to be done in haste if they are wisely and honestly done.

Now, I think neither side of the House would claim for a moment that there had not been serious mistakes made, some of them excusably made, because action had to be had, and some of them, I have no doubt, not honestly made. Well, I think that we may ascertain the condition during the present and during the recent past and punish those who have improperly acted and to give notice to those who are called upon to act now and notice to those who shall succeed us that we had best not draw the blanket concealing what is past and forget it, because thereby you would be encouraging other violations of law through maladministration.

Now, I am not going to say or intimate—because I do not know—whether during this war there have been more mistakes made in the United States by Congress and under the administration than have been made in other countries, considering the size of the great contest; whether more mistakes have been made relatively than were made during the War of the Revolution, according to numbers, or during the War of 1812, or the Mexican War, or the Civil War, or the Spanish-American War. Those are behind us. The present is with us. I am a believer in forgiveness, I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. "Blessed is he who forgives." Yes; I believe in all that. Shakespeare, in his Timon of Athens, says, "Nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy."

For the remainder of this Congress or in the next Congress we are not going to confine ourselves to "stomach aching" on the one hand and criticizing on the other, but something of that kind will have to be done. There will be plenty of work for these investigating committees that have not been holding meetings formally for many years and have not been exercising their jurisdiction as committees on expenditures. There will be plenty of chance for investigation. However, I would not neglect the proper legislation in order that we might investigate.

The next Congress, no doubt, as this Congress has done, will perform its duties with such wisdom as it may have. I have great confidence in Congress. I have great confidence in the House and Senate. I have great confidence in the courts. There is plenty of room to criticize here and there and yonder. I have great confidence in the American people, proceeding under the Constitution and the law. I am a pretty "mad democrat" in the broad sense of the word. In my recollection I have trod every path, almost, from the cradle up to the time I expect I ought to die, that the humblest citizen of the United States has trod in his early life. I repeat, I am a democrat in the broad sense of the term, and I am a citizen of the one country on earth that has the greatest capacity for self-government. [Applause.] And, God knows, I want it to keep that capacity. [Applause.]

There is talk about autocracies and democracies. Who are the autocrats? The Kaiser was one; the Austrian monarch was another. There was autocracy in Turkey. There was autocracy in Russia, and Russia has graduated in anarchy. There is not much of autocracy in Great Britain. They have a pretty good Government there, by the people, a pretty fair democracy there, because it has been well said that they respond promptly to the sentiment of the people as it is voiced at the ballot box. An Englishman said to me, "While we have great respect for the King, yet we all understand that he is like unto a figure 9 with the tail cut off." [Laughter.] Well, thank God, that is not exactly the case in this country, although sometimes I wish part of the tail was cut off. [Laughter.] I speak with high respect for everybody.

Somebody said once of a friend of mine—a Member of Congress, by the way—and the remark originated on that side of the House about another man on that side of the House, and both are out of Congress and both are dead: "See D.; he sets his tongue to running and then goes off and leaves it." [Laughter.] I do not want to be subject to that criticism nor do I want to be subject to another criticism, such as one that ex-Speaker Reed made about a Member of Congress who was talking and consuming a good deal of time. A page came to me and said, "The Speaker wants to see you." I walked up to the Speaker's chair, and I said, "What is it, Mr. Speaker?" "Joe," he said, mentioning the Member's name, "when he talks he subtracts from the sum total of human knowledge." [Laughter.]

For fear I will do the same I will bring my remarks to a close, with the statement that I believe this is a good bill. It is not perfect. I would be glad if we could remove the temptation to spend money that has been appropriated and authorized by repealing the laws appropriating it and authorizing it to the aggregate of $15,000,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] such time as he may desire.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think at the beginning of my remarks, which I hope will be reasonably brief, I should state to my colleagues and Members of the House who are not acquainted with the organization of the Committee on Appropriations that I am not a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies which prepared this bill, but it so happened that I was requested by the chairman to attend the hearings in connection with the preparation of the bill which we now have before us, and so far as I was able to do that, and still give attention to the hearings before the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill, I did so. I do not, therefore, claim to be familiar with all of the facts on which the final action of the committee was based.

The hearings and examination have been most exhaustive. The chairman of the committee has again shown his ability and capacity as an investigator, as a seeker after and a developer of facts, and he has been ably assisted by the members of the subcommittee on both sides.

This bill, unique in all the history of legislation, proposes to repeal appropriations heretofore made amounting to approximately $7,000,000,000. It proposes to withdraw authorizations to contract heretofore given amounting to approximately $8,000,000,000; $15,000,000,000 in all, an enormous sum, a gratifying sum, taken from the totals that might have otherwise been expended. And yet, after all is said and done, it is not extraordinary that we are able to withhold from the War Department approximately $7,000,000,000 of appropriations out of a total of $24,000,000,000 granted to that department since the war began and out of a total of nearly $17,000,000,000 appropriated for the War Department within a twelvemonth. Only four months of the fiscal year now running had passed when the armistice was signed, and yet the committee was only able to find the sum of less than $7,000,000,000 out of appropriations of almost two and one-half times that sum for the fiscal year which it felt it could safely withhold. So much of the War Department, indicating the tremendous rapidity with which we were spending money at the time the armistice was signed.

So far as the naval service was concerned, after the most careful and painstaking examination of its estimates, the committee found only $331,000,000 of its appropriations for 12 months that could be saved, the war ending 8 months before the close of the fiscal year. What would have been the condition of affairs with regard to appropriations had the war continued? How much would the Navy have spent at that rate had conditions existed as they were at the time of the signing of the armistice? What it means is that the Navy has spent and proposes to spend as much money in 4 months of war and 8 months of peace as it was estimated it would spend in 12 months of war, and that the Army in 4 months of war and 8 months of peace expects to spend nearly three-quarters as much as it estimated and as was given in appropriations for a full year in the highest tide of the great war.

It is not remarkable that the committee was able to withhold and withdraw these sums. The extraordinary thing is that these services were spending money at such a rate that with only four months of war and one-half of the year past and gone the very great proportion of the appropriations were either spent or so obligated that the appropriations can not be safely repealed. The committee is not therefore entitled to any particular credit because it has brought in these repeals and withdrawals of authorizations in the sums carried in the bill. It is, however, entitled to credit for having conceived the idea of bringing in a general repeal bill, and it is entitled to great credit for the businesslike thoroughness of the examination made, a thoroughness which will be demonstrated by a perusal of the hearings, which do not, by the way, contain half of the testimony actually given before the committee. The subject was gone over with very great thoroughness, particularly with regard to the War Department, and not once, but several times, in an effort to still further increase the amount which might be withheld and withdrawn from expenditure.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman says that not half the testimony appears in the printed hearings. Was the remainder of it confidential, or is there any reason at this time, after the war is over, why the information upon which the gentleman's committee based its conclusions should be withheld from the remainder of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is a member of a committee which has exhaustive hearings, and the gentleman knows that in taking testimony before a committee there must necessarily be a good deal of preliminary talk and examination in many cases in order to arrive at a mutual understanding as to the character of the information sought and what can be hoped to be secured in the way of evidence before beginning to make the official record. That is for the purpose of making the record clear and concise, and not burden it with talk back and forth intended to clear up the situation. This in order that in the record the questions may be to the point and the answers clearly intelligible. There was very little testimony withheld from the record because of its confidential character. There was some testimony as to the saving in expenditure expected to be made by reason of closing out contracts which it would serve no good purpose to publish at this time, but it was a very small part of the testimony given. There are sometimes conversations between the chairman or members of a committee and the gentlemen who appear before the committee to give testimony, in the way of opinions expressed, which while interesting and forceful do not necessarily belong in a printed statement of testimony given before the committee.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman's idea is a good one, and I wish more committees, including my own, would follow that idea of eliminating nonessentials.

Mr. MONDELL. The idea is not mine. It has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations since I have been with it, and it is peculiarly the practice of the present chairman of the committee, who endeavors to clear a situation before the record is made. I think it is a wise and proper procedure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the War Department have been spending money at so greatly an increased rate over what they originally estimated, what assurance has the gentleman that the amount now allowed is going to be sufficient to carry the department through?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think anyone need have any fear on that point, and I am glad the gentleman asked me that question, because it is in line with what I have in mind to discuss.

As vast as are the sums of appropriation repealed—and $7,000,000,000 is quite a considerable sum even in these days—we still leave available such enormous sums that by no possibility can the War Department or the Navy Department run short in any necessary and essential line of activity. And while I am personally of the opinion, from what I have heard of the testimony, that we might safely have still further increased the repeal of appropriations by several hundred million dollars, I yield my opinion in that matter to members of the committee who are better informed as to some of the details of the examination than I am. I believe, however, that we could have increased very largely the sums of appropriations repealed, not only for the War Department but for the Navy Department as well. But the Navy Department clings to its appropriations with a tenacity that leads one to doubt the proverbial story of the drunken sailor, and to believe that the citizen who, while in an intoxicated condition, flung his money about so freely was not a sailor at all. [Laughter.] He must have belonged to some other branch of the service. At any rate, the Navy Department certainly does not willingly let go of any of its appropriated money when it is sober, and the Navy Department was very sober all the time it was before the committee.

As a matter of fact, the longer the hearings continued the smaller the sum of the contemplated repeal came to be. Early in the progress and development of the investigation there was a very considerable hope of a withdrawal of appropriations several hundred millions of dollars in excess of the sum actually carried in the bill. But as time went on and the gentlemen connected with the services further considered the situation, they concluded that in order to play a perfectly safe game it would be necessary to increase their estimates of the amount of liabilities that must be met. Out of the sums remaining enterprises can still be carried forward that ought not to be carried forward. Expenditures can be made that in my opinion ought to be dispensed with, and it is for that reason I would have been glad to have seen the appropriations still further trimmed in order, if possible, through this action to give the Congress control, to a very considerable extent at least, of the peace-time activities of these war organizations.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware of the fact that it is seldom indeed that a department having a sum awarded to it does not spend all that is given it.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. It leads to this thought, that while the war was on—and I was one of those who said and practiced it—it was our duty to give the departments of the Government every dollar which they insisted was necessary for the successful conduct of the war. We were justified in that attitude. It is the only attitude that a legislative body could properly take in time of war in the absence of unquestioned knowledge and information on the subject, which a legislative body can very seldom have. It was argued in favor of such a policy that the money would not be spent unless it is needed.

This bill is a denial of any such claim or suggestion as that. Why are we able to withdraw but $7,000,000,000 from the enormous war appropriations totaling $24,000,000,000 since the war began, with the war virtually at an end four months after the beginning of the fiscal year? Because the War Department having the money proceeded to spend it as fast as they could. The only reason why there is any considerable sum to take back is not because there was careful consideration of needs and a withholding of placing of obligations in view of such consideration, but because the productive capacity of this mighty Nation, great as it is, far beyond that of any other people on earth, was not great enough to enable them to spend the money they had, or even contract to spend it.

In the main, they went just as far and just as fast as the ability of the Nation to make or the disposition of the citizens to contract would allow them to go, with the result that they are obligated to take vast quantities of material for which we have no need and much of which is of little peace value—which are practically of no value.

I do not want to be unfair. I realize the pressure upon all these people to provide material, and more material, and still more material, to pile it mountain high against our needs over yonder, and that they knew they would be seriously criticized if there was any shortage. Therefore the necessity of procuring and contracting material in great quantities. The difficulty was there was no careful intelligent consideration of the amount of certain classes of material that under all the circumstances could be, or was likely to be, used. So that the amount bought and the amount contracted for was based very largely not on the probable needs carefully considered but on the capacity of the country to make and the willingness of the contractor to agree to make.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am interested in what the gentleman has to say about the expenditures in the Navy Department, and I have been wondering during the course of his remarks if the gentleman would be kind enough to particularize a little further, as it might have some bearing on the appropriations asked for from the regular Naval Committee. So far the gentleman's remarks have been rather general to be of any value in detail.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for making the suggestion, because what I have said relates very largely to the Army and Army expenditure. The committee did not go into anything like as detailed an investigation of naval expenditures that they did of the Army expenditures, for the very good reason that they were met at the threshold with the statement that the Navy did not have any considerable amount of money they could give up. The committee did withhold $334,000,000 from the Navy, but turned around and gave them $280,000,000; so, as I recollect it, we are only $54,000,000 to the good as far as the Navy is concerned, as between pulling back and handing out. The naval appropriations for the fiscal year 1919 have amounted to almost $1,800,000,000. About $54,000,000, or less than 3 per cent, is the net salvage.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I judge from what the gentleman says that there were projects that the Navy Department insisted on carrying forward that could have been cut off.

Mr. MONDELL. My statements in regard to these matters relate principally to the Army, and what I am saying, except what I said in regard to the Navy disposition to cling to its funds, mainly relates to Army expenditures.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that the Navy had a nucleus, a real organization, and were in a position to submit more accurate estimates?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman means that they did not have so much to give back because their estimates were more reasonable or more nearly within their actual needs?

Mr. LAZARO. The Navy was really a going concern and had its nucleus organization, whereas the Army, under the new draft system, was new.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not inclined to make comparisons.

Mr. LAZARO. I am just asking the gentleman the question for information.

Mr. MONDELL. It has heretofore been developed, and developed by the chairman of this committee and stated by him on the floor at the time the first deficiency bill was brought in, what character of estimates the War Department made, estimates apparently with little rhyme or reason. The gentleman will remember the details of those estimates as explained by the gentleman from Kentucky at that time and as elaborated somewhat by myself. Congress could not very well withhold an appropriation insisted upon of $94,000,000 for bandages, but there was not a Member in Congress who did not know that amount of bandages would wrap every soldier in the Army like Rameses when he was laid away for his long slumber. The Military Committee ought to have known when they made their appropriations for horseshoes and forage and matches and other things that they were appropriating much more than the Army could possibly use for such purposes unless they shod the soldiers with horseshoes and had the soldiers put in most of the time striking matches. The vice of that kind of estimating is that it gives a fund that is used or contracted, and when you come to the piping times of peace, or to the dawn of that glad and happy time, you find that no matter how large the appropriations were and how much in excess of actual need, there was a temptation, which was unfortunately frequently yielded to, to spend the money or obligate it if there was a place under the sun where the material could be found or a citizen willing to contract to furnish it.

There were some things brought out in these hearings and in other hearings touching matters on which some committee of the House ought to have functioned before this time. It is not the business of the Committee on Appropriations to legislate touching military affairs. How many camps and cantonments shall we permanently maintain in this country? How many enormous areas for artillery practice, how many aviation schools and fields, how much money shall be spent on enterprises of that character? Where shall work cease, and to what extent shall it be carried forward? Up to this good hour it is all left to the War Department, except for suggestions that may have been made here and there by some one on the floor of the House or the Senate. We have left money enough in the hands of the War Department, after withdrawing all these vast sums, that it may go as far as it desires with regard to any one of these camps or cantonments or fields.

I did not have the opportunity of hearing the chairman of the committee make his statement, but I presume in the course of his remarks he referred to the opinion to be voiced by him of the members of the Committee on Appropriations as to what should be done and should not be done with regard to three certain camps.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I did not, although I had a memorandum to do that. I was diverted, and I talked more than two hours. I propose to do that, however, when the various items are reached before the bill is passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I shall leave that to the gentleman from Kentucky, because that is a matter that he was to present to the House and which I supposed he had presented as he tells you he will do so later.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is another question which I think the gentleman might well propound with reference to these other committees, and that is, How much longer are we going to continue in time of peace making lump-sum appropriations by tens of millions or even hundreds of millions?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not expect me to answer that question, does he?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; except in the way that he has spoken of a somewhat similar fault, so it seems to me, on the part of other committees.

Mr. MONDELL. Having given all the sums that were asked for, where the need and necessity could not be absolutely disproven, which was the proper practice in the war, I suppose we shall so continue along certain lines, more or less sentimental, connected with the war and with the men who fought in it, for some time to come. We may not always act wisely in those matters, but the probability is that most of us will resolve our doubts in favor of the opinion of those who are charged with certain responsibilities touching the establishments we created, and particularly affecting the interests of the men who composed them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In considering these various bureaus, having to do with the expenditures for aviation, did the Committee on Appropriations come to any opinion as to whether or not there was great waste due to the multiplicity of agencies contracting for aviation materials and trying to erect an aviation outfit?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no way of determining whether the Committee on Appropriations as a committee had any opinion on that subject, because the committee was not called upon, officially or unofficially as a committee, to express an opinion upon that matter or to function upon it.

If the gentleman asks my opinion——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That would be very acceptable.

Mr. MONDELL. Which may or may not be of value, I would say that in my opinion there was enormous waste, common to all of these enterprises, and additional waste in view of the fact that so many different agencies of the Government had to do with the same sort of activity, each insisting on its own plant and facilities. Until we shall once more in the grace and providence of God have a Government in which the legislative branch controls the policy, that will go on. We have been drifting into a condition—and I am not saying that wholly with regard to this administration by any means—under which the great policies of the Government are not fixed and established by the men the people select for that purpose, but by executive officials who, through one plan of persuasion and coercion and another, manage to successfully fix and establish the national plans and policies. I regret as much as anyone can, as a Member of this House, to be compelled to say that, but it is the truth, and it is a truth for which we are all somewhat responsible.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Wyoming, of course, is on the Committee on Appropriations. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he does not believe that some of the evils of which he has been speaking in connection with the Military Establishment of this country could be cured to some extent if all the power to make appropriations for the Military Establishment were centered in one committee?

And I want to ask, further, whether or not he would not favor such a proposition?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, now, frankly, I will say to my friend that I do not care to give expression to the opinion I have on that subject in this presence. We have had some experience in the Committee on Appropriations relative to Army appropriations we did not originate that leaves in my mind certain opinions which I do not think I care to express here and now. Of course, the gentleman's inquiry involves the possibility of transferring it all to the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Full jurisdiction over it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. In that connection let me make this suggestion: In my opinion it would be a splendid thing for this land of ours if one committee appropriated for every branch of the Federal Government. Not because one committee has more able or courageous men than another, but that a committee having to do with one service in the very nature of things comes to be greatly influenced by that service. I have heard folks say—I am not expressing it as my opinion or denying the truth of it—that committees having one branch of the service to appropriate for come to be to a considerable extent simply the mouthpiece of the particular service for which they appropriate, the champions of and apologists for that particular service.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I have some sympathy with what the gentleman is saying, but are there hours enough in a day for the men on any one committee to familiarize themselves with all the different branches of the service so that they could carefully make appropriations for those various services?

Mr. MONDELL. I grant you that the plan which my statement suggests is not without its serious difficulties. It would mean a dividing of one committee up into many subcommittees, and you might find in those subcommittees the same condition to which I have referred; but this is true, and I say this of the work of the Committee on Appropriations not because I am a member of that committee, but because I have watched the work of that committee for 22 years, that because of the fact that the committee in its work has a survey of all public activities—sooner or later, either in direct appropriations or deficiencies, it is brought into contact with every activity of the Federal Government—the committee takes a broader and more impartial view of governmental affairs than any other committee. By reason of the character of its work it is never tempted to become the special champion of any particular service. It has to balance one service against another and one class of appropriations against another, and comes to realize more clearly, I think, than a one service appropriating committee does, that one of the most important functions of an appropriating committee is not to give but to withhold. In such a general committee we learn that the most energetic and faithful public servant in the executive departments is frequently the man who must be most checked in his demands upon the Public Treasury.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I gather from the gentleman's very interesting discussion that he criticizes the extent of our appropriations for the war, does he not?

Mr. MONDELL. I could not well do that, for I voted for every one of them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does not the gentleman think that the reason we have this amount of money to be saved to the Treasury is rather because of the termination of the war than because of appropriating too large a sum? Is it not the gentleman's opinion that if this war had gone on for the fiscal year as it was going on that instead of being able to turn money into the Treasury we would in all possibility have had a deficiency to make good?

Mr. MONDELL. My friend did not hear my opening remarks.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not.

Mr. MONDELL. Because in my opening remarks I emphasized that fact that the wonder was not that we were able to withhold $7,000,000,000 of appropriations but that, with only four months of the fiscal year in war and but six months passed, so large a portion of the enormous appropriations made must, in the opinion of the officials charged with responsibility, still remain subject to obligations that had been placed upon them. Why, had the war gone on at full tide, there is no calculating how much money we would have spent; and, inasmuch as we only withhold $54,000,000 from the Navy, it is very evident that, had the war continued, the Navy would have spent very much more than had been appropriated.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it fair to criticize the War Department for placing orders that Congress had empowered them to place, no matter how large they were, if they were to be required as the war went on?

Mr. MONDELL. I discussed that at some length a moment ago.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am very much interested, and that is the reason of the remark.

Mr. MONDELL. I did discuss that at some length. I want to discuss for a moment some of the great enterprises, the great objects of expenditure which are still fully and completely under the control of the War Department, the policy touching which Congress has at no time had in its control or guidance. Let me again suggest now that a very distinguished member of the Committee on Military Affairs is here and I can speak freely; that I have not been able to understand why the Committee on Military Affairs has not functioned, beginning directly with the signing of the armistice, on the proposition of what the policy of the Government is going to be touching all these camps and cantonments which have been built at such an enormous expense——

Mr. GORDON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. And touching the lands on which they are located.

Mr. GORDON. I will tell the gentleman why. The Secretary of War appeared before our committee and said he was considering buying these cantonments and had all the authority he needed and all the money he needed, but he would like to have the advice of the committee on it, and before giving our advice we asked him to give us a list of the real estate that the War Department owns, including what had been purchased before the war, and we are now waiting for that list before giving our advice. [Laughter.] Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is as good an answer, I take it, as can be given, because the gentleman is apparently in possession of all the information there is on the subject. But how about Nitro, W. Va.? What are you going to do about the $60,000,000 investment?

Mr. GORDON. We have never done anything about it up to date. We appropriated lump sums, and you say you voted for all of them.

Mr. MONDELL. That particular lump sum I voted for after a statement made before our committee with regard to it, to the effect that no part of it was going to be used for the building of plants unless it might be a few thousand dollars. That statement was made, and is of public record, relative to the appropriation out of which that costly plant was built or started. I am informed it is to be yanked. Does the Military Committee know?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Out of what appropriation is the War Department now paying for land in South Carolina and in Kentucky for three additional Artillery firing fields? Certainly it did not come from our committee.

Mr. MONDELL. May I ask the distinguished gentleman, who is a member of the committee that legislates on such matters, under what law or appropriation they are paying for it?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, who does, if a member of the Military Committee does not?

Mr. GORDON. It is under the same appropriation as the Nitro plant about which you speak. The Committee on Appropriations probably appropriates for those.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Appropriations does not control or assume to control the policy of the War Department. If it did, its items would go out on a point of order. The gentleman knows that.

I do not want to criticize any committee of this House. Heaven knows that we all have troubles enough, and I realize that the gentlemen on that committee are strong, honest, courageous men. I do not want to criticize them, and I will not criticize them. But may I be allowed to criticize a policy or a lack of policy? I think there are some very fertile fields to plow, and they are mighty weedy, and some one ought to get into them, and some one ought to give the opinion of the Congress touching the policy that is to be followed. My understanding is that the War Department wants to continue all the camps and all the cantonments and all the firing fields and all of everything else that it has. It has abandoned Nitro because even the War Department could not stand for it. But otherwise the work largely goes on. There is this other side to it. After all, is it not the duty of Congress to say to the War Department what they should do? After all, is it not our duty to say to these gentlemen, "This is our plan; this is our policy"? Who is to blame that they go on with these developments and building and buying programs, when the Congress, which is supposed to fix policies both in peace and in war, has expressed no opinion in regard to them, except as our committee has expressed an opinion with regard to certain camps, which will be stated by the chairman of the committee as the bill is discussed? We owe it to the War Department to say to them what the Congress thinks about these matters. If they go on with all the camps and cantonments and all of the other plants to a final conclusion with the moneys that are left—and there will be plenty of moneys left after the $7,000,000,000 are withdrawn—we will not be free from responsibility.

Congress told them what to do in time of war, and that was to provide for the men that Congress ordered into the field, prepare for the great struggle, fight it to a finish, and they went about doing that. But what of the future? If we are going to have universal military service in the United States, and every man of a given age in camp, we may want all the camps and cantonments. If we are not, we do not need them. I take it that nobody on the Committee on Military Affairs hesitates to express an opinion, because they have not made up their minds on the highly important subject. If we are going to become a great military Nation at the time when we are preaching peace on earth, good will to men, then we want all the camps and firing fields we have; but if we are not, if we mean what our eloquent spokesman is saying for us over yonder, then we want to halt some of these tremendous expenditures of the public money and try to get back to a sane and sound basis, whatever we may determine that sane and sound basis to be.

Mr. Chairman, there will be many things to be inquired into after the 4th of March. There will be no more things to be inquired into because it is a Republican Congress than ought to be inquired into if the Congress were Democratic. As one Republican I want to express the view and the opinion that the Republican Party when given a majority of this House by the American people was not granted any license to run amuck.

The worst thing we could do from a political standpoint would be to try to use the faults and the failures of this war for political purposes. But, on the other hand, billions of the people's money have been spent; great programs have been carried out, many of them without the warrant of congressional sanction. It is claimed that the expenditure has been grossly extravagant, and we have a very good reason for the opinion that it was when we hear men in the public service, charged with responsibility over enormous sums, say, "Yes; we propose to get results without any sort of regard to what they cost." From one viewpoint, perhaps, that was justified. But to spend money lavishly because it is necessary to accomplish a given purpose and to throw money to the winds unnecessarily in the accomplishment of that purpose are two very different things. The American people are entitled to know what has been done with their money. They are entitled to know who planned and proposed certain programs. They are entitled to know why they were carried on, and it will become the duty of the Republican Congress in good conscience and without malice and without desire to gain political advantage to develop the truth.

We have been engaged in a great work. It has necessarily cost a great deal of money. It was unavoidable that there should be mistakes. Enormously increased costs were unavoidable. Taking all these into consideration, giving them all due weight, in my opinion many things will come out that will astound the American people.

Gross recklessness, the wildest extravagance, and, above all, a lack of judgment and horse sense that is almost unbelievable. Responsibility can not be lodged on the shoulders of subalterns here and there. It goes back finally to the source of power; "Like master, like man." Given strong, vigorous, virile, intelligent, courageous direction, and the spirit permeates the entire organization down to the humblest man in the ranks; but given lack of initiative, lack of courage, lack of force, lack of directive effort, a disposition to smirk it all away and let it rip, and the outcome we have seen is inevitable.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Such a lack of proper spirit will permeate the mass and eventually reach every man in the organization.

Mr. GORDON. I infer from the gentleman's observations that he is prepared to be shocked and astounded by the revelations which are to come by these investigations?

Mr. MONDELL. I have been.

Mr. GORDON. Already? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am now immune. I think nothing can come out now that will shock me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. MASON. My recollection is that about a year ago, when you were on the floor, you explained the danger of the cost-plus plan which the party in power had for the letting of contracts. I think you demonstrated that it was an invitation to larceny. I think you stated that even good men would be tempted by it, the promise that the more they spent the more they would get. They even got a commission on the money they stole from the Government. I was going to ask the gentleman, who is on the Committee on Appropriations, whether there was any change in the matter of letting contracts after his speech of that day I think it was a year ago. Or did they still continue to say to those favorites who received contracts, "The more spent, the more you get"? I ask if there was any change in the program after your speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman's inquiry is whether my statement had any effect on the executive departments, I would say to him, so far as I know, it did not; I did not expect it to have any. [Laughter.] The executive has not at any time been accepting suggestions from Congress. I merely felt it my duty to make those observations.

When I was a young man I was left in charge of what we called a force-account contract. That is one of your cost pluses. It was an intricate, difficult job in frozen ground, in a cold, miserable country, under trying conditions. The people who had to have the work done did not know how much it ought to cost and therefore were not willing to let a contract. As I was the youngest and most easily imposed upon member of the organization, I was left in charge of the job.

We were to get so much a day for men and teams and tools and machinery and 10 per cent on top of that. As the old gentleman who owned the outfit bade me good-by, smirking because he was going to get out of a hard job, he said, "Frank, I hope you will come out of this thing with some conscience left."

Mr. BUTLER. Did the gentleman succeed. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I will leave that for the gentleman to judge. Modesty forbids an answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I think you did.

Mr. MONDELL. He said, "You will have everybody loafing on the job in spite of all that you can do; even the mules will know that the more they loaf and the more the job costs the more we get. But," he said, "for heaven's sake, keep the organization down to hard work as well as you can under the circumstances."

I knew by experience that nothing so disorganizes a working force as that sort of a job; and when I heard of the cost-plus business I took the first opportunity, out of recollection of those early days, to express my opinion of that utterly indefensible system of doing business. I am utterly unable to understand how anyone with any knowledge of human nature, with the slightest experience in business matters, could expect anything but the scandal and disaster which come out of the system. Those cost-plus contracts have been responsible, very largely, for the general industrial disorganization of the country. The evil effect of it did not cease with the spending of unnecessary money. It carried on and on, diffusing its evil influence all over the country and into practically every avenue of industry.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Did he vote in favor of the report on this bill that we have here?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I voted for the report.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman remember the item on page 11 of the naval emergency fund of $33,000,000? Does the gentleman know what that covers?

Mr. MONDELL. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I am not as fully informed about that item as I would like to be.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am familiar with it, and I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what he would have done if he had been on the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BUTLER. I would have done the same thing, but I would not have criticized the plan after I had voted for it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, that does not follow at all. I may be required to pay the obligations of the Government without agreeing that the obligations of the Government ought to have been incurred.

Mr. BUTLER. I doubt, too, whether they should; but nevertheless we have to vote.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, I realize what is running through the gentleman's mind. Because an undertaking was unwarranted, because an evil policy has been followed, and because there has been extravagance, should we withhold an appropriation to meet the obligation? What sort of a fix would we find ourselves in if we proceeded to do that?

Let me again state to the gentleman the view I have had with regard to these appropriations from the beginning. Every appropriation that a responsible executive officer said was necessary to the conduct and successful prosecution of the war and every item of appropriation or legislation which on their honor they said was necessary to meet the Government obligations I voted for and shall vote for, but in doing so I did not give my approval, and I do not now give my approval, of the expenditure or of the way in which the money was spent.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Has there been a change of system, so far as the cost-plus contract is concerned?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think it is true that since the signing of the armistice there have been no such contracts. I have not heard of any. Of course, there would not be the slightest excuse for such a contract after the signing of the armistice, if there was any excuse at any time.

In view of the criticisms, in view of the knowledge coming to the officials themselves of the vicious character of these contracts, I think much earlier than that there was an effort to get away from them; but still the departments adhered to them with some more or less important modifications far too long, resulting in enormous expenditures.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some of the newspapers carry headlines announcing the reporting of this bill to the effect that we are turning back $7,000,000,000 into the Treasury. Some of them have gone so far as to say that we have turned back $15,000,000,000 into the Treasury. No part of the money that we are trying to save by withdrawing the authority to spend it is in the Treasury. Far from it. There are billions of appropriations still current for the meeting of which there is no money in the Treasury. We are simply clearing the books to a certain extent, so that he who runs may more easily read the probable obligations of future bond issues and future tax burdens. It is well that the committee did this. It is the only thing the Congress has done up to this good hour that I can recall that in any way affects the policy of this Government touching expenditures, touching the carrying out of programs. It does not go far enough to clip or compel the abandonment of such selected or aggregated programs as the department may insist on carrying forward, but it does not leave money enough for them all. To that extent Congress is asserting its authority in determining that there shall be some limit to the expenditures. I do not want to seem to overcriticize naval and military men, who are insisting upon still holding vast sums for expenditure. They would not be worthy of their profession if they did not believe in it and believe in its maintenance and expansion; but it is our duty to say how far these things shall go. Our view should be the view of the people as against the military view.

Therefore we might well go further, and the Military Affairs Committee of the House might well go further, in laying down a program and in checking expenditures along lines of questionable value to the country. Thank God that the time has come when we can pass a bill like this; that the time has come when we can begin to think sanely, when the dove of peace is again returning to the earth. May the coming of peace bring with it a revival in this House of the proper spirit of our American institutions, a revival of the determination on the part of Congress to take its place again as the body in this Government charged with the responsibility of outlining programs, establishing policies, and placing the limit upon governmental activities. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAGEE. I did not clearly understand the gentleman's statement. It has been stated that some $7,000,000,000 is turned back into the Treasury. Do I understand that that is an amount which has been appropriated?

Mr. MONDELL. Evidently the gentleman was not present to hear the early part of my remarks. The bill repeals approximately $7,000,000,000 of appropriations and repeals approximately $8,000,000,000 of authorizations of expenditure.

Mr. MAGEE. Has any part of this $7,000,000,000, which the gentleman says was appropriated, been actually raised?

Mr. MONDELL. I just said, if the gentleman was listening, that the loose statement frequently made that we were turning money back into the Treasury was, of course, not true. Not only has this $7,000,000,000 not been raised, but the money for appropriations of many other billions of dollars has not been provided for in the way of revenue and must be provided for through the bond issues that are coming and the payment of the tremendously heavy taxes provided for in the revenue bill. As a matter of fact, we are this day sailing without any very great balance in the Treasury; but in the offing is a great bond sale and the enormous sums that will be raised by the revenue bill. Notwithstanding all of the faults and failings of those who are charged with responsibility, all of the tremendous expenditures that have been made, and all the vast sums that will have to be raised and paid, it is after all well with the Republic, for by the valor of the boys who went overseas the tide of the great Hunnish wave was turned back and victory came. May the peace conference now gathered at Versailles establish that peace in perpetuity by establishing it in righteousness and justice. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

CONTINGENT AND MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES.

District Building: For fuel, light, power, repairs, laundry, mechanics, and labor, not to exceed $2,500, and miscellaneous supplies, $12,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a clipping from the Waco News-Tribune, of Waco, Tex., dated January 8, 1918. This clipping purports to give copy of an order issued by Gen. Buck, who is in command at Camp MacArthur. This clipping is as follows:

OFFICERS ADVISED SOCIALLY—CAN'T MINGLE WITH ENLISTED MEN—BY COMMAND OF GEN. BUCK ORDER POSTED REGARDING ENTERTAINMENTS.

The following order has been posted at Camp MacArthur:

Headquarters, Camp MacArthur, Waco, Tex., January 6, 1919, General Orders, No. 1.

1. The attention of officers of this command is called to the impropriety of attending social affairs at which enlisted men, or persons in the uniform of enlisted men, are present.

Hereafter any officer of this command who finds enlisted men present with proper authority, i. e., duly invited or permitted to pay their way in, at any social affair at which the officer is a guest, such officer will at once depart from such social affair, and if he finds persons in the uniform of enlisted men permitted to be present he will take the same action.

When an officer finds enlisted men present at any social affair without proper authority, he will take such steps as the occasion may warrant to cause them to leave, and will report any violation of regulations which may occur.

By command of Maj. Gen. Buck.

W. H. WOOLWORTH,
Major, Infantry, United States Army, Acting Executive Officer.

Official:

E. E. LAMBERT,
Major, Adjutant General's Department, Adjutant.

Mr. Chairman, this clipping shows the spirit of caste existing in our Army even to this day. It shows the harsh and overbearing attitude of the officer class. It shows, as I have often said before, that our Army is the most undemocratic institution in America.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good deal of this un-American system of caste. The fact that this system of social discrimination is practiced in the Army has been denied from time to time. It has even been officially denied, but all who are familiar with Army life know that this order here at last brought to light in print discloses an actual practice lived up to by our officers of the Army, and which has been lived up to for years.

We have carried on a war for democracy. We have gone to Europe to carry democracy to the people there, and yet we are fighting against it here at home. In Europe our Army and Navy are being used to promote democracy. Here at home these same instrumentalities are being used to suppress democracy. Those who are responsible for the spirit of caste which characterizes the Army have no comprehension of the principles they are affecting to teach.

I want to say that there can be no real political democracy where there does not exist a social democracy. [Applause.] There can be no real democracy that we can carry into a foreign land when we deny to our boys who carry that torch in their hands the right to be regarded as men here at home. The men who fight our battles are good enough for any officer to meet as equals. They are entitled to be treated with respect and consideration.

Look at this order and analyze it. An officer is supposed to be a gentleman; this order put into effect would make it impossible for an officer to be a gentleman. If I were to invite two brothers to eat at my table, one being an officer and the other an enlisted man, that one who was an officer when he saw his brother at the table would be compelled to leave, or if he felt that his brother was not rightfully there, then he would be compelled to force his enlisted brother to leave the premises. Under this order even a discharged soldier wearing his uniform can never be good enough for an officer to associate with. There is not a boy who has been in the service who has not felt the effects of this caste spirit and system. There is not one who does not resent it. There is not an enlisted man who does not dread the social gulf that exists between officer and enlisted man more than the dangers that he endures. They dread it more than they do the hardships of the service.

Most high Army officers are in favor of a permanent system of conscription. I want to say to them here that by their overbearing conduct toward the enlisted men they are doing more to make Army life unpopular than any "pacifist" could by preaching against militarism. I warn them that they can not get away with it. No system of compulsory service in time of peace will ever be endured by the American people so long as Army officers adhere to such outworn, overbearing, and undemocratic methods as disclosed by this order. What are we going to do about it? What are the American people going to do? Well, so long as the Army was a matter of professional soldiers, of men who were not compelled to go into it, the people took no great interest in the matter. But since the Army is composed of men who are serving whether they want to or not, the people of this country are going to see that they are treated decently. We will have a democratic Army or we will have none at all. Let the General Staff ponder that. They are pushing for a big Army. They consider themselves patriotic in that. Yet by tolerating—yes, fostering—the caste system they are making it impossible to recruit an Army.

Talk about violating the espionage act. Hundreds of honest men have been sent to jail for talking against conscription. Yet by keeping up a system of social oppression of enlisted men the officer class have done more to make them dissatisfied than thousands of unbridled agitators could have done with their talk. I do not blame Gen. Buck more than others. He has merely put into black and white a rule of the Army recognized by every officer. It is the men who control the Army, mold its spirit, and who make and change its customs and practices who are responsible. And the Navy is worse than the Army. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the disposal of city refuse, including the same objects and under the same limitations specified for this purpose in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $220,000: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to investigate conditions affecting the existing contract for the collection and disposal of ashes in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1919, with a view to determining whether any adjustment should be made in the compensation paid thereunder, and to adjust the same, provided the facts disclosed the necessity for such adjustment: Provided further, That the said commissioners may, in their discretion, with the consent of the contractor and his bondsmen, cancel such contract, and in that event, or in the event of failure of the contractor, to take such steps as may be necessary to carry on the work covered thereby, and for that purpose to purchase or lease the necessary plants, buildings, and land, to purchase or hire horses and horse-drawn vehicles, passenger-carrying and other motor-propelled vehicles, equipment, and machinery, and to employ expert and other personal services, and labor, and to pay traveling, maintenance, incidental, and contingent expenses: Provided, That not more than $70,000 of this sum shall be expended for the collection and disposal of ashes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph in order that the chairman may make some explanation of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Mississippi has had charge of this matter, which is a District of Columbia matter, and he can better advise the gentleman than I myself.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this item involves primarily the ash contract. They have under this item several matters to dispose of. The ash contract was entered into, as I recollect it, for about $79,000. After the war broke out wages were increased to such an extent that the company that got the contract was unable to carry out the contract to move the ashes. Now, the District Commissioners have the option, of course, to declare the contract void, and under the contract they could, if the money was sufficient, perhaps go along and remove the ashes, but they would have to take over the plant. The purpose of this provision is to enable the District Commissioners to make the best arrangement they can in reference to the removal of the ashes, because they might take a forfeiture of the bond—and I have no objection to their taking that course—but that would not move the ashes. The principal expense of moving the ashes will be in this present month and the two months succeeding. What ought to have been done prior to this is what we have done in reference to garbage, to allow the District of Columbia to take over the entire matter, because the wagons and equipment that have been used for one purpose can be used interchangeably for the other. The purpose of the provision is to enable the District Commissioners, if they decide to do so, to take over so much of the plant, the wagons, and horses as will be necessary to move the ashes.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say that the wagons for moving the ashes can be used to move refuse and garbage?

Mr. SISSON. Because they can be.

Mr. MANN. It might be in a country town, but not in the city. If the wagons are moving ashes, they can not move garbage.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman ought to understand that in summer there are very few ashes to move; there is a great deal more garbage moved in the summer than in the winter.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this is to let the District Commissioners let the contract, but the gentleman has given us no information on that subject. When was this contract entered into?

Mr. SISSON. The contract was entered into something like 14 or 15 months ago.

Mr. MANN. These are annual contracts, are they not?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I think this is. Some are for three years, but I think this is an annual contract. The facts are that this labor was worth $1.25 a day or $1.50.

Mr. MANN. Labor was worth as much 15 months ago as it is now and perhaps more.

Mr. SISSON. The labor that this man employed has gone up to where it is impossible for the man to complete his contract. Horses have gone up, and we even went into the price of feed to the extent of getting the quotations about the date that this contract was entered into.

Mr. MANN. I know there has been no special increase in the price of labor during the last year, and certainly no increase in the price of horses, and no special increase in the price of feed. What this amounts to is that if the contract goes against the contractor we relieve him, but if it is going in his favor he keeps the contract. That is all it amounts to. Heads I win and tails you lose by the contractor.

Mr. SISSON. We are not confronted with a theory here; it is a condition. What we want is to get the ashes moved.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman makes the primary mistake of providing a contract that will not get the ashes moved.

Mr. SISSON. It would get the ashes moved in normal conditions.

Mr. MANN. These are normal. The contract had been entered into.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will look into every department of the Government he will find that every department is paying nearly twice as much and sometimes more than twice as much for labor as they were before.

Mr. MANN. Twice as much every day as it was the day before, does the gentleman say?

Mr. SISSON. No; I did not say that, but prior to the war.

Mr. MANN. This has no relation to conditions prior to the war.

Mr. SISSON. It has, absolutely.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that the contract was entered into for this fiscal year.

Mr. SISSON. It was entered into some time before the actual date for moving ashes.

Mr. MANN. The fact is that the District Commissioners are disposed to give contracts to friends.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that that is true.

Mr. MANN. And if the contracts do not pay the contractors, they want to let the contractor out and have the Government pay the difference.

Mr. SISSON. My information, on the contrary, is that the District Commissioners desire to take a forfeiture on this man's bond, but they want to be in a position to move the ashes when they do take it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they presented this item, and this item came from the District Commissioners.

Mr. SISSON. I know it did.

Mr. MANN. It does not provide for a forfeiture of the bond.

Mr. SISSON. They do not have to do that.

Mr. MANN. It provides that the District Commissioners shall settle the contract; and why do they ask that? Because they already have agreed to do it, if they get the authority.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know whether that is true.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is a matter of public information.

Mr. SISSON. The purpose of this is to have the ashes removed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I shall insist upon the point of order as to the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I have reference to the first and second provisos, and on them I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional for two tractors, motor driven, $4,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for information. I have never heard of this term "tractors" being used in connection with the apparatus of a fire department. Will the gentleman explain what a tractor is?

Mr. SISSON. A tractor takes the place of the horses, and carries the fire equipment, whatever it may be, to the fire, instead of having it drawn by horses.

Mr. STAFFORD. But you provide in the next paragraph for three engines, motor driven, and also in the following paragraph for chemical and hose cart, motor driven.

Mr. SISSON. They are substituting these motor-driven tractors for horses wherever they can.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose, then, it is like the forward part of the truck, where it is intended to put the trailer behind, and have it rest on the part carrying the motor.

Mr. SISSON. If you have a hook and ladder, for example, instead of having it drawn by horses you would have it drawn by a tractor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Employees' compensation fund: For compensation provided by "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, including medical, surgical, and hospital services, and supplies provided by section 9, and the transportation and burial expenses provided by sections 9 and 11, $700,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 21, after the word "expended," insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For salaries and expenses of the United States Tariff Commission, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $50,000."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I offer this amendment, as I would any amendment to this bill, with some hesitation, because the bill has been most thoroughly considered, this item—or at least this general proposition—among others. For one, I feel that the Committee on Appropriations is deserving of great credit for this bill. I of course do not assume to know all the details of the bill, but, on the face of it, it saves to this Government something like $15,000,000,000.

It is difficult for the average human mind, gentlemen, to appreciate the significance and vastness of this sum, but if I do not forget entirely the figures that I am about to mention, this bill authorizes a saving of an amount equal to more than half the total amount that it cost this Government to live from the first inauguration of George Washington until the second inauguration of President Wilson. The committee deserves great credit for having brought in a bill which will bring about this enormous saving of the public funds. The gentleman from Kentucky will go down undoubtedly in history as the master money saver of the American Congress. [Applause.] For one, I infinitely regret that he is not to be with us in the next Congress, and I know that I am right in saying that it is the unanimous judgment of Members on both sides of the aisle that his shoes will be mighty difficult to fill. [Applause.] Now, the gentleman from Kentucky explained this morning the request made by the Tariff Commission. Let me call attention to the fact that the language of this amendment I propose would be simply and solely to appropriate for the use of the Tariff Commission the amount authorized by the law which created it. This commission was created in 1916, and $300,000 was authorized to be expended annually for its maintenance. As a matter of fact, however, due probably in the first year to its small organization, something less than $200,000 was expended. Last year, on account of the war, necessarily having to diminish its functions to some extent, and being deprived also of the services of some of its employees who went to the war, it again lived within less than $200,000. It is true, as the gentleman from Kentucky has stated, that it might not be wise to go so far as the Tariff Commission suggested, which was to appropriate $100,000 in this bill, which would bring the average expenditures up to $400,000. I do not advocate that. I merely advocate that we should allow the Tariff Commission, under all the circumstances, the actual amount authorized by the act which created it. I realize, of course, that conditions are abnormal, and they may continue abnormal for some years. I do not undertake to prophesy when Congress may pass or propose a tariff law. It is utterly impossible to predict, but it seems to me that in the meantime we can not get too much information as to facts, whether they are gathered under abnormal conditions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I have a few minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Even though those facts are collected under abnormal conditions, it may be possible that this Congress will necessarily bring in tariff legislation under abnormal conditions, and it seems to me that the facts that might be acquired even now would be of service to the Government. I am one of those who believe that Congress can not get too much information about industrial questions. I, perhaps, if I had been charged with the appointment of this particular Tariff Commission might not have named every one of its members. I think it would have been wiser if a division of the two political schools of thought had been better carried out than they evidently are in the personnel of our present Tariff Commission. But, after all, their function is not to advise the Congress as to policies, but merely to provide the facts which will be reduced to legislation in accordance with the views of whatever party may be in power. Now, the effect of this amendment if passed would merely be to give to the commission the amount authorized, and certainly some increase over the funds now available is necessary if any larger investigations are to be undertaken. In fact, I think it would be fair to say that $200,000 nowadays would not bring results greater than would $150,000 at the time we first authorized the creation of this Tariff Commission. It seems to me, then, it would be wise if we now, instead of waiting until a later date, establish a policy of granting this commission at least the funds which were authorized by the act which created it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this Tariff Commission was created and it is legal. The amendment is justified under the law. The amount fixed under the law to be expended as authorized was $300,000. There was expended last year, I believe—that is, the first year of its existence—$188,000 in war times.

There was appropriated for the service this year $200,000. That is $100,000 less than was authorized, and not directed by the legislation creating the commission. Of course, it awaits appropriation, whether it should be $188,000, $200,000, or $300,000. It seems to me, as one Member of the House, I am not in favor of the amendment. The amount, I say again, that was appropriated was $200,000, and in the first six months the commission expended $100,000. It could not have expended more under the law touching appropriations. That leaves for the last six months the same amount that was expended for the first six months of the fiscal year, namely, $100,000. Now, the amendment is to appropriate $50,000 for this six months, which would make——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would make $150,000 for the six months.

Mr. CANNON. Which would be running at the maximum that is authorized by the law.

I am not going to run amuck and criticize the organization of this Tariff Commission. Gentlemen understand about it. It consists, I believe, of five who are not of the same political party. Well, we could not have an issue of fact to say whether it was fairly appointed or not from that standpoint. If we would submit it to a jury and I should take the affirmative, I think I would have no difficulty in showing that there was a mistake made in carrying out the true intent of the law of Congress. But I will not discuss that. I doubt the propriety now of expending at the rate of the limit of the law for the last six months. We have not peace yet. Our principal competitors are Great Britain, Germany, France, the Balkans, Russia—in fact, the world—that are not producing at this time. We have an abnormal condition touching production in the United States. The gold dollar is worth only half as much as it was when this war broke out, which means that other products measured by the gold dollar are worth just what they were before, but double in dollars when you come to consider the whole proposition.

Now, we could not abolish this Tariff Commission if we were to try. It would not be in order upon this bill. What good could possibly come now from a practical standpoint by having this commission investigate by sending people abroad? A friend of this appropriation appealed to me and said, "We want to send people to Europe." I replied to him, "If you send them to Europe, you would have to give them a guard to protect their lives." Now, I think we had better go along as we have been going.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better go along and make the expenditure as was recommended by the committee, which is less than was expended last year. Some friend has said that they wanted this done because there are a lot of people that know a heap about economic questions and that have been employed in the war, and they are now being discharged and would like to have the money for a few months in order to give them employment, and that it was thought they would do valuable service. Well, that would be good for the men, but will it bring anything that will enable the next Congress or the one after that, with changing economic conditions, to come to a just and proper conclusion? I think we best let the bill stand as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee more than a moment, except to say that I agree with what the gentleman from Illinois has said in regard to this matter.

The act provides that $300,000 may be appropriated for this purpose. The Congress last year appropriated $200,000. That commission asked in this deficiency for $100,000, the balance that we authorized to be paid. Now, as was explained to the committee a moment ago, the subcommittee cuts this out for the reason stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Whatever information you might be able to get about the cost of things now and about the price of labor at this time would be of no earthly use to us when things are in the abnormal condition in which they are now throughout the world. In view of that fact, the subcommittee did not give the appropriation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me suggest to the gentleman one industry, at least, which has sprung up in this country since the war began and which did not exist in this country at the time war was first entered into. I mean the dye industry, and with that industry other chemical industries. It is an abnormal growth, if you please. We had little information in the past as to the methods and the cost of production of dyes in this country. Would not that one industry be enough to justify at a time like this, when we must realize that no one can tell how soon Germany will be able to produce dyes again, this increase in appropriation? Would it not be of value to have all possible information? And the Tariff Commission has been working very hard upon that question. Does not that justify the continuance of the Tariff Commission?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman understands this does not interfere at all with the Tariff Commission. It is simply a special fund that they want in addition to the amount Congress has heretofore appropriated. It does not interfere with their present activities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It interferes with their present activities to the extent they are now receiving only two-thirds of the amount Congress authorized them to receive.

Mr. SISSON. That was the very limit of cost.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This necessarily cripples their field of usefulness.

Mr. SISSON. As to the dye industry, that would be in just the condition other industries are in so far as labor and the cost of producing dyes in Germany and the cost here are concerned. You can not establish any rule, in my judgment, upon which to base a tariff, either from a revenue or protection point of view, that conditions might not change overnight. The changes will be very rapid, and for that reason the committee did not allow it.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any detailed discussion of this matter, but in common with some of the other members of the committee I was disappointed when I learned that this item was not embraced in the pending bill.

I am impressed with what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] says, so far as it goes; but it is very important for this country to follow the changing economic conditions, especially during the reconstruction period, and to gather from them such lessons as they offer, just as other commercial countries are doing at this time, and I think really it is a mistake not to allow this commission to proceed at this time with the normal development of the work which it has in hand and which during the next 6, 12, and 18 months will be of extreme value to every Member of Congress and to every business man in the country who is earnestly striving to understand economic conditions as they will be more or less transformed following the war. I say, therefore, I regret that the committee did not see fit in its wisdom to make this allowance.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I think he will understand that this money will only be available until the 1st of July anyway, and within that length of time the amount of information they could get would be very slight, and the current appropriation bill will take care of the investigations that will be made after July by this commission.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that he has doubtless done so, but if he has not, if he will run through the documents, the manuscripts, the productions, and the reports which the Tariff Commission has already prepared with extreme care, he will recognize the value of the work that is being done. With some of the information I frankly say I do not agree. Some of it will be agreeable to my views, and some of it will be more agreeable to those of some of my colleagues on the other side; but in view of what I consider to be the importance and the accuracy of the economic facts which they are developing, which will be of much value to every Member of the House, no matter what his predilections may be with respect to customs or other phases of economic conditions, I am of opinion that this small amount of money could not be expended better than in the direction asked for by the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it has always been a peculiar thing that when the total amount of an appropriation which is authorized by law for any commission is not appropriated the commission at once is up in arms.

Now, here is the Tariff Commission. I have read their last report. I doubt whether very many Members of the House have done them that honor. They have been practically useless during the war. But the Tariff Commission remained as a commission, and all of them who remained drew their salaries, although several of them are doing other work—one of them in the Post Office Department, giving no attention whatever to the work of the Tariff Commission, and one of them somewhere else, giving no attention to the Tariff Commission. I am probably expressing the opinion of those two gentlemen at least when I say that there was no work for the Tariff Commission to do during the war, and I reckon the rest of the Tariff Commission practically acquiesce in that view, because they have done nothing.

But I will say this: The commission is made up entirely of what we call "free traders" on our side of the House. Contrary to the spirit of the law, there is no protectionist on the commission. This distinguished commission of free traders have expressed the opinion that a tariff for protection in some cases is highly advisable and necessary. Now, to that extent I welcome their education, although acquired at considerable expense to the National Treasury.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a second. On this side of the House we do not need the education. On that side of the House it is useless to attempt to educate them on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far as the Tariff Commission itself is concerned, does not the gentleman believe that the result of the investigations will lead to the irresistible conclusion that some protection is necessary?

Mr. MANN. I do not know what conclusion it will lead them to. I do not need it. If they could ascertain facts as to the cost of production of articles, either here or abroad, that would be of value. But we all know perfectly well that they can not obtain facts relating to the production of any article, including dyestuffs, either here or abroad, which would be useful under normal conditions. Now, I am in favor of putting a protective tariff upon dyestuffs to protect the American industry that is built up on dyestuffs. I do not undertake to say what the rate should be, and I undertake to say that the Tariff Commission will not know what the rate should be before it is fixed.

I think it is a good thing for the Tariff Commission and the other commissions under the Government to feel that they will have to be economical for a while. We will have the very mischief to pay to bring down any department of the Government to any reasonable idea of economy, and we can not afford to go ahead and appropriate money as we have done in recent years and months for what they call the normal expenses of the Government, because they have increased. I know of no branch of the Government to-day outside of the War and Navy Departments which is not asking for an increase of money. Although they have already had increases beyond the normal conditions, they now want more. Somebody has got to pay the bills if we appropriate the money.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee more than a minute or two on this matter, but I think it is only fair to take issue with the statement of fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asserts, that the entire personnel of this Tariff Commission is made up of men such as are normally designated as "free traders," and I am quite sure that the actual fact is far from that. Certainly Mr. Culbertson, a member of that commission, would very indignantly deny that the characterization correctly represented his political viewpoint.

Just another word touching the debate that has developed. It is interesting, to say the least, that the two gentlemen who are not by committee assignments engaged in special work in connection with tariff making should deny the need of any information, whereas the gentleman on the Republican side, who by Republican committee assignment is charged with that particular work, should admit the desirability of it.

Having said so much, I simply desire to say that the committee did consider, in view of the questions that are larger than simply the question of the tariff commission, that at this time it was not desirable to appropriate additional money; and with the latter part of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I am in entire accord. It is going to require the constant vigilance of Congress to hold the departments of the Government down to anything like normal activity, and there will, to my mind, be a very heroic struggle in the next Congress to reduce to order and to ordinary size the departments of the Government that have very greatly expanded in recent years. And you are going to be met constantly by the advocates of the departments with pleas for their special activities. And then the same people who make the pleas will complain over the sum totals of the burdens that are placed on the Government. It was having those general views in mind that made the committee, irrespective of its individual views touching the work of the commission and of its personnel, agree to eliminate from the bill the estimates that were submitted; and on behalf of the committee I hope its action may be approved by voting down the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

New Orleans, La., customhouse: For additional for the completion of the remodeling, repair, or improvement of the old customhouse and post office, $13,700.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question with regard to the remodeling of the customhouse at New Orleans, where an appropriation of $13,700 is recommended.

I have before me the estimate of appropriations for construction in connection with this deficiency bill, where the department asked that the sum of $18,000, which was realized from the sale of the old copper roof of the customhouse, be returned for that purpose. I find that the committee in its wisdom and sense of economy has seen fit to reduce that amount by some $5,000. I shall be very glad if the gentleman will tender some explanation.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman please, the committee did not consider that because a given amount had been realized from the sale of the roof therefore that amount should be appropriated. If the gentleman will turn to page 682 of the hearings, he will find that there was an estimate made there as to the amount of money that would be required to do the work that the Supervising Architect indicated they desired to do now and which totaled $17,700. There was one item for the lining or facing of walls and spandrels under stairs at front entrance with marble. That seemed to the committee to be an expenditure that was not fully warranted under the present circumstances, and therefore the committee recommended a reduction of the amount from $17,700 to $13,700.

Mr. DUPRÉ. My inquiry was in view of the fact that this sum had been realized from the sale of the copper roof. It was not directed to the point that that amount should be returned to the source from whence it emanated. I wanted to know why the committee in its wisdom had seen fit to cut down the estimate of the Supervising Architect. The committee is opposed to marble facings, I understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not say they are opposed to them or in favor of them, but they are opposed to this particular item in this particular instance, because it did not seem to the committee that at this time that expenditure of $4,000 for the facing of walls and spandrels of the stairway with marble was a necessary expenditure.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In connection with the gentleman's desire to reduce expenditures, then, he has cut down this amount by $4,000 in order to prevent this amount being spent for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to commend the gentleman and the committee for their economy. I hope they will practice it on all other measures. I notice, of course, that they have done so in connection with the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am human and make mistakes, but on the floor I simply voice the sentiment of the committee, and in this matter that is their judgment.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman from Kentucky is humorous.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES.

For the temporary employment of such additional force of clerks and other employees as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the existing situation may demand, $4,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress on the first day of its next regular session a statement showing by bureaus or offices the number and designation of the persons employed hereunder and the annual rate of compensation paid to each: Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum, not more than five persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $2,400 per annum each, and not more than 35 persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation in excess of $1,800 per annum each.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, end of line 3, strike out period, insert colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein shall be used unless all former Government employees who have been drafted or enlisted in the military service of the United States in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions appropriated for herein if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of the position."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. DYER. The point of order, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, does not lie.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am serious in saying to the gentleman that it does lie. I think I can point out three or four statements that make it not germane. It is not germane, although camouflaged by the language "Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used," and so forth.

Mr. DYER. It is a pure limitation. We have had the question up; the identical language was submitted on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the point of order was overruled by the then Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. It was the opinion of those who spoke upon it, including quite a number of Members of the House and some of the best parliamentarians in the House, that it was a limitation on the fund of money provided for in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do, and I want to be heard on it. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with what the gentleman stated occurred in regard to the legislative bill, and while I do not care to be put in the position of appealing from the court, I am still of the opinion that, though as distinguished a gentleman as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] held this in order, he was wrong. I think it can be clearly demonstrated.

There has grown up in the House a practice, a very loose and vicious practice—and I say it without meaning to reflect upon the merits of the amendment—of assuming that by simply saying, "Provided, That no part of the sum shall be expended," that you can do anything afterwards affirmatively that you see fit and not thereby violate the rule in regard to legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The language of this amendment reads:

Provided, That no part of any appropriation herein shall be used unless all former Government employees who have been drafted or enlisted in the military service of the United States in the war with Germany shall be reinstated on application to their former positions appropriated for herein if they have received an honorable discharge and are qualified to perform the duties of the position.

That requires affirmative action on the part of the bureau to which it applies, and undertakes to make the expenditures of money conditioned upon the doing of an affirmative thing, whereas the rules of the House provide that the limitation shall simply restrict the money upon a negation and must not involve an affirmative proposition necessary to be carried out. It is conceivable that the purpose which the gentleman desires to accomplish might be so worded as to come within the limitation, but the language as submitted requires affirmatively that the department shall reinstate the applicants to their former positions if honorably discharged and members of the military service. I insist that it is clearly legislation and not a limitation. The chairman will find in connection with the rule in the House Manual, page 825, this statement:

Such limitation must not give affirmative direction and must not impose new duties—

And so forth.

That was the ruling made by Chairman CRISP, one of the best parliamentarians in this House, March 11, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands from the parliamentary clerk that this identical question was up the other day and that this identical language was used.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be true, but I do not happen to agree with the decision of the Chairman on that date.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to see the ruling of Chairman ALEXANDER, and if the gentleman will indulge the Chair and pass this over temporarily——

Mr. SHERLEY. I am quite willing to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over temporarily.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

For the disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, civilian employees, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, fiscal years 1918 and 1919, $2,473,782.68.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, after line 9, insert—

"Ordnance Department: For payment of the claims for damage to and loss of private property occasioned by the explosions and fire at the plant of the T. A. Gillespie Co., at Morgan, N. J., which have been agreed upon by the War Department and the claimants and are enumerated in House Document No. 1735 of the present session, $268,211.26."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee will recall that some months ago there occurred a very disastrous fire and explosion over at Morgan, N. J., in connection with what is known as the T. A. Gillespie plant. It was a governmental plant being operated by the Gillespie Co., but a plant the ownership of which was in the Government, and it was in the strict sense of the term a Government plant. As a result of that explosion great damage was inflicted upon the property of people living in the vicinity, and in point of fact on property of people living quite a number of miles away. In the last deficiency act that was passed a provision was carried instructing the Ordnance Department to inquire into and ascertain the extent of the claims for damage to property that had resulted from this explosion. The Ordnance Department did create a commission that has functioned, and they made a number of reports to the Congress. They have actually examined and cleaned up claims that aggregate something like $900,000, but they were not in shape to-day to present to the Congress a formal statement enumerating the amounts, so as to make a clear identification. It is expected that before this bill shall have become a law they will be in a position to submit the additional claims in such form as to enable them to be clearly identified legislatively, and those claims will embrace all of the damage sustained except by, perhaps, the railroad and telephone companies and one or two other claimants. Most of these claims represent small amounts of money for people who had their homes more or less destroyed, who had windows blown out and ceilings destroyed, and many of whom have been out of doors and subject to more or less charitable aid in order to maintain themselves and their families pending the adjustment of these claims. The committee therefore felt that it should do everything that it reasonably could to expedite the settlement of claims of this character. The committee has very carefully safeguarded, by reference in the proposed amendment to enumerated claims just recorded, the moneys which will be expended, and those moneys will all go to the claimants therein named, who will not in any instance be the representatives of claims about which there could be any question, and the question of the reimbursement of the Red Cross, questions that might involve matters of remote cause, are not included herein. Under the circumstances the committee felt warranted in proposing this amendment to the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the reservation of the point of order, I desire to say that only to-day was the document, No. 1735, referred to in the amendment available to Members of the House. When this proposition was presented as an addendum to the bill as reported by the subcommittee I do not believe any member of the general committee had any conception that the total amount of claims would run into the millions of dollars. Certainly I did not. The report shows that the grand total, as stated on page 5, covered by this report is $3,151,810. It is true that, beginning on page 5 and running back to page 67, there are a large number of small claims, I suppose aggregating several thousand dollars, for damages to window glass and paint and the like, where I notice that the commission, consisting of a colonel of the Ordnance Department and a major of the Ordnance Department and a civilian, reported virtually in full for the claims as presented. In the report they said that the amount is about 10 per cent less than the total face value of the claims. I am surprised that on a mere inspection perhaps 90 per cent or even 99 per cent of all these claims have been allowed. I can not think that this board of three went into the adjudication of the merits of the claims very closely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is drawing a conclusion that is not entirely warranted. There are a great many instances in which these people did not present a formal claim in dollars and cents, but simply made a claim for damages done to their houses; and this board then investigated the matter and undertook to ascertain the extent of the damage, and I gather the impression on the testimony before the committee, as well as the reports previous to this that were filed, that this board had functioned pretty intelligently and pretty conservatively.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, if the gentleman would examine the report closely he would see that 9 out of 10 of the claims presented were allowed at the very amount as presented. For instance, I just read at random. Take the very first claim, that of George Horley. The claim is for $5.35 and the amount allowed is $5.35. Take the next claim, $18.73; amount allowed, $18.73. Take the next, $71.21; amount allowed, $71.21. Take the next, $514.06; amount allowed, $514.06. And right on down the allowance of these claims is the amount as presented.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, if he will look at the character of the claims he will see they are matters about which there need be no dispute. The question of the value of the glass of a window that has to be replaced is one easily ascertainable. Now, the testimony of these men was that they had their own experts to examine into the damage and estimate the cost of restoration, and that they have taken every proper method of checking up those expenditures; but here are a lot of little claims, such as the gentleman has indicated. Now, I think my record in this House is that of one not to be swept off his feet in the desire to pay claims, because I have appreciated how frequently the Government was liable to be imposed upon; but here are dozens of people, poor people—literally poor people—people who have to live from day to day, with claims running from $5 to $75 or $100, and so forth. It seems to me that the Government having its own agency, having created a board for the determination of these claims, can afford to appropriate the money without holding the claims up to a time when probably it will mean nothing to the recipients thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with the gentleman that these claims should be disposed of, but I was quite surprised on an inspection of this document, as there reported, that in so many instances they allowed a claim at its face value. But I rose more to inspect the language of the amendment as it is prepared to see that it would not involve the Government in recognizing claims as carried in this report of which there may be some question and as to whether there is an obligation on the part of the Government, as, for instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and those very large claims running into hundreds of thousands of dollars. It may be a question whether the Government should reimburse these corporations, for the reason that they carry, if I am not misinformed, an insurance fund to reimburse them against the very character of losses such as are sought to be recompensed by this bill. As I understand the report of this board of two Army officers and one civilian, they say on page 2 of the report they do not in any instance allow any claim which was covered by insurance.

I read from the report:

This is in all cases the amount of loss less any insurance received thereon.

As I stated a moment ago, I did not wish to have this phraseology in any wise a recognition of any obligation on the part of the Government to pay these large claims which run up into hundreds of thousands of dollars. For instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has a claim for $644,000 here, though we only appropriate the total amount as carried for these small claims——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering whether the phraseology would recognize the obligation to pay any of these large claims.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not so intended. It was for the very purpose of avoiding the paying of any claim that might be of doubtful validity that the committee did not carry the provision in the bill as reported out. But, as the gentleman will recall, the chairman was authorized to offer an amendment to deal with such claims as might be arranged, classified, and scheduled, and I took the trouble of suggesting to the Ordnance Department that the committee wanted to have enumerated in each case the amount of the claim, the character of the claim, the amount that had been asked, and the amount that had been awarded, so that we might know in detail that we were not paying any claims that we ought not to pay. I think the gentleman will find from an examination of these claims, which total the amount I am proposing to carry in this bill, that there are none in here of doubtful value. I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman thinks it will make it any more certain, after the word "enumerated" in the amendment which I have offered, to insert the words "and scheduled," so that it will appear as "enumerated and scheduled" in the House document.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that would make it somewhat clearer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified. The reservation of the point of order is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 9, after line 9, insert:

"Ordnance Department: For the payment of the claims for damage to and loss of private property occasioned by the explosions and fire at the plant of T. A. Gillespie Co., at Morgan, N. J., which have been agreed upon by the War Department and the claimants, and are enumerated and scheduled in House Document No. 1735 of the present session, $268,211.26."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a further amendment to follow the amendments that have just been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 9, after line 9, insert:

"The Secretary of War is directed to consider, ascertain, and recommend to Congress the amounts which in his judgment are due on claims of persons, not employees of the United States, for compensation for disability or death resulting from personal injury sustained from the recent explosions and fire at the plant of the T. A. Gillespie Co., at Morgan, N. J.

"Provided, That claims shall not be recommended hereunder for persons or in amounts which would not be allowable under the United States employees' compensation act if the individual were an employee of the United States."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to enable this same board to function upon some claims for injury to individuals resulting in physical disability or in death. The testimony shows that there were something like 21 Government employees of this plant who were killed and some 31, not employees of the plant, who were killed. There were perhaps 30 or 40 persons who suffered injuries of more or less serious character, but which did not result in death. It seemed to the committee that it was well, in view of the machinery that existed in connection with these claims, that they might have authoriy to investigate and to report. The amendment does not give authority to make findings that would be binding upon Congress. It expressly instructs them, in making their findings, to make them within the scope that exists in regard to the payment for injuries of Government employees under the workmen's compensation act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I was under the impression that the committee had directed that there should be a qualification or a condition inserted in the amendment that the board should investigate as to whether the deceased or injured had received any compensation under any State law; and if so, that that should be reported also to the Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is that the workmen's compensation act takes in view, in connection with awards that may be made to governmental employees for injuries received, just such matters as those to which the gentleman is alluding, whether they have insurance or whether third persons have incurred partial liability, and to the extent that may be the Government's liability is controlled.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say to the gentleman that I obtained a copy of the Government workmen's compensation act yesterday afternoon, intending to review it last evening, but I had other work which prevented my examining it. Has the gentleman any objection to allowing this to go over until to-morrow, subject to the reservation of the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to pass it over, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to pass over the amendment, with the point of order reserved. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, $2,570.84.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15140) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOUSTON and Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania rose.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS—HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] will permit, I would like to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that would depend upon whether the business in order to-morrow would be dispensed with or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. To-morrow being Calendar Wednesday, I will couple with that a request that the business in order on the calendar to-morrow be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Kentucky couples with that the request that the business in order to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HOUSTON, by direction of the Committee on the Census, submitted for printing under the rule the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1005).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 24, 27, and 28.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, forestry and forest products, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. A census of Guam and Samoa shall be taken in the same year by the respective governors of said islands and a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the governor of the Canal Zone in accordance with plans prescribed or approved by the Director of the Census."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "$5,000; the chief clerk and three chief statisticians for the divisions of population, manufactures, and agriculture, respectively, $4,000 each; three"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out insert the following: "for the divisions of vital statistics and statistics of cities, and the chief statistician provided for in section 3 of this act, $3,600 each; also, on page 4, line 9, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "$3,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate, insert the following:

"That whenever possible women and honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines shall be employed in the positions herein provided for, if in the judgment of the Director of the Census they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such positions."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, these"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following: "applicants claim to have"; also, on page 6, line 16, of the engrossed bill, strike out the word "or" where it occurs the first time and insert the word "of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"And provided further, That in the selection of the additional clerks and employees provided for by section 6 the Director of the Census is authorized to use, so far as practicable, the reemployment registers established by Executive order of November 29, 1918, so far as the same applies to permanent appointments by competition."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, place of abode, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries, nationality or mother tongue of parents of foreign birth, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, tenure of home and the encumbrance thereon, and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person.

"The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, value of farm implements, number of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the quantities of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. Inquiries shall be made as to the quantity of land reclaimed by irrigation and drainage and the crops produced; also as to the location and character of irrigation and drainage enterprises, and the capital invested in such enterprises.

"The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

"The census of manufactures, of forestry and forest products, and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31, next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

"Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

"The number, form, and subdivision of inquiries provided for in section 8 shall be determined by the Director of the Census."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

On amendment No. 1: This amendment strikes out all of section 1 as passed by the House and proposes to insert a provision providing for a very much enlarged census covering the additional subjects of education, health, and insurance, to be taken every five years, which would result in more than doubling the cost of the census. Your conferees restored the House provision and added thereto after the word "manufactures" in the first line of this section the words "forestry and forest products," so as to conform to section 8 of the bill as passed by the House, which directs an inquiry upon this subject.

On amendment No. 2: This amendment related to the quinquennial census directed by Senate amendment No. 1. The Senate recedes and restores the House provision without change.

On amendment No. 3: The House conferees accepted this amendment for the reason that it reduced the number of statistical experts from 15 to 10, thus decreasing the appropriation for this grade of experts $10,000 annually, or $30,000 for the three-year period.

On amendment No. 4: Your conferees recede from this amendment for the reason that the necessity for this legislation has passed in view of the fact that hostilities have ceased and the draft process is no longer in operation.

On amendments Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9: These amendments all relate to the salaries of the executive and administrative officials of the Census Office. The bill passed by the Senate provided for four chief statisticians, at $4,000 each, and three other chief statisticians, at $3,000 each. The compromise reduced the number of chief statisticians by one and provides for three, at $4,000, and three, at $3,600. As amendment No. 3 reduced the number of statistical experts from 15 to 10, there is only a net increase of $1,300 in this section over the bill as passed by the House, and there is a decrease of $2,200 over the bill as passed by the Senate. Your conferees therefore accepted the compromise and receded.

On amendment No. 10: This amendment provides for a graduated scale of salaries, beginning at $900 and terminating at $1,800, with a difference of $60 between classes from $900 to $1,440, and $120 between classes from $1,440 to $1,800, so as to provide more frequent promotions. It will also make possible a more equitable adjustment of salary to the varying degrees of merit and efficiency of employees.

The section as passed by the House failed to provide for the employment of clerks at $1,000 and $900 or for an engineer and two photostat operators, which was undoubtedly an oversight.

During the decennial census period the bureau will undoubtedly occupy one or more buildings outside the Commerce Building, where the permanent force is now housed, so that it will be necessary to have an engineer to look after the heating, lighting, and other equipment of the bureau.

On account of the tremendous increase in the volume of work they will also require the services of two photostat operators. The bureau states that these operators will save their salaries over and over again in making photostat copies of tables, letters, etc., which would otherwise have to be typewritten or copied by hand. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 11: This amendment prohibits the Director of the Census from employing more than 150 clerks at the rate of $1,440 or more per annum, and is made so as to conform to amendment numbered 10; hence your conferees recede.

On amendment No. 12: The conferees changed the phraseology of this amendment so as to include marines, and added at the end of the changed paragraph the following provision: "if in the judgment of the Director of the Census they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such positions." This language is similar to that contained in section 1754 of the United States Revised Statutes, giving preference to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty.

On amendment No. 13: This amendment provides that the examinations for clerical positions prescribed by the Director of the Census shall be subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 14: This amendment simply provides that the clerical force employed in the Census Office shall be selected by the Director of the Census in the order of rating. Hence the House recedes.

On amendment No. 15: This amendment strikes out "Census Office" and inserts "Government service," which change is in conformity with existing law. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 16: This amendment simply strikes out the word "may" and inserts the word "shall." The House recedes.

On amendment No. 17: This amendment is simply a change of phraseology. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 18: This amendment corrects a grammatical error. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 19: This amendment is simply the insertion of a comma. The House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 20, 21, 22, and 23: These amendments propose to correct grammatical errors by changing the phraseology from singular to plural. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 24: This amendment proposed to strike out a provision of the House that not more than one person shall be appointed to a clerical position from the same family. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 25: This amendment provides that, so far as practicable, the director shall use the reemployment registers established by the Civil Service Commission as a result of the Executive order of November 29, 1918. The House recedes with an amendment that the words "of the Census" be added after the word "Director," in line 20 of the bill.

On amendment No. 26: This amendment proposed to strike out all of section 8 as passed by the House and to insert certain provisions that would have been required in case Senate amendment No. 1 had been adopted by your conferees. In conference the House text of section 8 was restored and the words "forestry and forest products" added in the second line of the third and fourth paragraphs of said section in order to conform with the language used in the first paragraph of the bill as passed by the House. In addition thereto the phraseology of the last paragraph, relative to the number, form, and subdivision of inquiries, as passed by the House, was changed so as to make it clearer.

On amendment No. 27: Section 9 as passed by the House provided for the appointment of supervisors by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census and the Senate amendment proposed that they shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This amendment also contained certain legislation relating to amendment No. 1, which was not agreed to. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 28: This amendment is not necessary, as Senate amendment No. 1 was not adopted by your conferees; hence the Senate receded from this amendment and restored the House text.

On amendments Nos. 29, 30, and 31: These three amendments simply correct typographical errors that were made in the printing of the bill. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 32: This amendment simply changes the phraseology, so the House recedes.

On amendment No. 33: The House bill directed that an enumerator should be an actual resident of the subdivision within which his duties are to be performed, but made an exception in the cases of persons residing in the same city. The amendment simply makes the same rule applicable to persons living in townships and other civil divisions. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 34: This amendment proposes to expedite the enumeration in cities which had a population of 2,500 or more inhabitants at the last census. This means that the work must be completed in two weeks instead of one month. A large number of cities which had more than 2,500 inhabitants and less than 5,000 inhabitants in 1910 now have over 5,000 inhabitants. The House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 35 and 36: These two amendments simply correct grammatical errors. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 37: This amendment conforms to a similar provision in the Thirteenth Census act. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 38: This amendment provides that the Director of the Census is authorized to furnish transcripts of tables and other records upon the payment of the actual cost of such work, with the understanding that in no case shall the information furnished be used to the detriment of the person to whom such information relates. The House recedes.

SANITARY CONDITIONS—PORTS OF EMBARKATION IN FRANCE.

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter addressed by me to the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter which he has addressed to the Secretary of War. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is it about?

Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania. It is with reference to the sanitary condition of the ports of embarkation in France.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

JANUARY 22, 1919.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just returned from a visit to the battle fields and devastated areas of France, where I had an opportunity to observe certain conditions as they affect our Army. I am prompted to set before you some of the adverse conditions which have come to my attention. My information comes from observation and through conversation with many officers and hundreds of private soldiers whom I have met and with whom I talked on trains, at stations, and in the villages and camps. I am fully mindful of the fact that conditions of army life can not be made to compare in comfort and convenience with those in civil life. Neither officers nor soldiers expect any such conveniences, but as citizens of the United States we feel that they are entitled to the best accommodations that can reasonably be provided.

We have been led to believe, through governmental publicity agents, that our combat troops were surrounded with safeguards to health and morale such as have never been known before in the history of warfare. To that end we have contributed without stint or limit. From personal observation I am convinced that the statement concerning the exceptional welfare of the troops is far from the truth, and when the soldiers return and are free to speak they will condemn in no uncertain language the incompetency and neglect of those who have been responsible for the loss of life and wasted health of their comrades.

I am free to admit that even under the most favorable circumstances war is wasteful; that irregularities are unavoidable; and that because of the uncertainties and sudden exigencies in the movement of troops proper provision can not always be made. But now that hostilities have ceased it seems to me to be wholy inexcusable and indefensible that soldiers should be subjected to such conditions as prevail in some parts of the Army in France to-day.

To make concrete what I have stated in general terms, may I call your attention to conditions existing at Camp Pontazzen, 4 miles from Brest? This is one of the ports where returning soldiers await the time of their embarkation to the States. For a year and a half this port has been a place of debarkation. One might naturally suppose that within that time adequate facilities for the care of troops would be found here. Yet wholly opposite conditions prevail. Troops arrive in crowded box cars, and, after standing for hours without cooked food, are marched through slime and mud and rain to this camp, where accommodations are supposed to be provided. It must be remembered that the men who have been brought to Brest during the past two months are mostly class B and C men, who have just been discharged from hospitals, where they have been treated for wounds and disease. Each man carries a full equipment (weighing about 60 pounds), with the exception of his arms and ammunition. Is it any wonder that out of a casual company of 150 men 64 of the number should fall out on the march from the station to the camp? Many of the tents have no floors and the troops do not all have even the customary straw ticks, but have had to sleep on the wet ground with only their blankets for protection. The lack of camp kitchens compels these convalescent soldiers to stand in line in the rain for from one to two hours to be fed. The very few barracks that have been provided for the officers leak, and most of them have no heat. The sanitary conditions, or, rather, the lack of sanitary conveniences, is thoroughly disgraceful.

The only explanation of the wonderful endurance and patience of the men under existing conditions is the overwhelming desire to return home at the earliest date and the knowledge that if they are taken to the hospital or make complaint that it will delay their home-coming.

I am aware that an investigation of conditions was recently ordered and that the public was told that the situation had been improved. I regret to advise you that most of my information deals with conditions subsequent to the superficial inspection, and I would most earnestly urge you to take some drastic action in this matter.

Surely the people of America, who willingly gave their sons and gladly contributed money to provide for their welfare, have a right to insist that decent provisions shall be made for them. Unless something is done to relieve such situations as I have described we may expect a harvest of death and disease that will make the casualties sustained in battle seem small by comparison. I am firmly convinced that this is a matter of vital importance, affecting, as it does, the lives of our returning soldiers.

Very truly, yours,
EDGAR R. KIESS.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to its previous order, until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 29, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letter from A. W. Lyman suggesting additional taxation on life insurance companies and also Federal control and operation of such companies (H. Doc. No. 1737); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Geological Survey for a special investigation and report on the power supply for the Boston-Washington industrial region to be made during the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1738); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Bureau of Mines for the American University Experiment Station, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1739); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting supplemental statement showing balances of appropriation, total amounts withdrawn from the Treasury, amounts covered into the surplus fund, and balances remaining in the Treasury, also expenditures made by the several bureaus and offices of the War Department since the passage of the act of June 15, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1740); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15098) to expel and exclude from the United States certain undesirable aliens, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1000), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. ZIHLMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5777) to refund to the corporate authorities of Frederick City, Md., the sum of $200,000, exacted of them by the Confederate Army under Gen. Jubal Early, July 9, 1864, under penalty of burning said city, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 999), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLAYPOOL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13480) providing for the refund of taxes collected for stamp tax on certain policies under the emergency-tax act of October 22, 1914, under the proviso to which act such policies were exempt, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1001), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12960) for the relief of Frank Walsh, Fred F. Fuller, and Otto F. Schroeder, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1002), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13109) for the relief of Clyde M. Giddings, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1003), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13469) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for a certain described tract of land for public-park purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1004), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15266) to increase the limit of cost for the Federal post-office building at Waterloo, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. RAMSEY: A bill (H. R. 15267) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the borough of Sussex, Sussex County, N. J., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH: A bill (H. R. 15268) to establish a gold currency and a silver currency on a basis of interchangeable value throughout the world; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 15269) donating captured German cannon and cannon balls to the city of Leavenworth, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15270) donating captured German cannon or cannon balls to the city of Topeka, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15271) donating captured German cannon and cannon balls to the city of Seneca, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15272) donating captured German cannon or cannon balls to the city of Hiawatha, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15273) donating captured German cannon and cannon balls to the city of Troy, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15274) donating captured German cannon or cannon balls to the city of Holton, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15275) donating captured German cannon and cannon balls to the city of Oskaloosa, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15276) donating captured German cannon or cannon balls to the city of Atchison, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15277) donating captured German cannon and cannon balls to the city of Horton, Kans.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 15278) increasing the limit of cost for a Federal building at San Pedro, Cal.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BOWERS: A bill (H. R. 15279) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the city of Piedmont, Mineral County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15280) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the town of Davis, Tucker County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15281) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to Romney, Hampshire County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15282) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to Petersburg, Grant County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15283) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the city of Morgantown, Monongalia County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15284) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the city of Keyser, Mineral County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15285) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the town of Parsons, Tucker County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15286) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the town of Franklin, Pendleton County W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15287) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the city of Elkins, Randolph County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15288) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the town of Thomas, Tucker County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15289) donating a captured German cannon or field gun and carriage to the city of Charles Town, Jefferson County, W. Va., for decorative purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 28, 1919.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a further communication in the Newberry-Ford contest, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The communication is as follows:

To the honorable THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

My attention has this morning been called to a communication to your honorable body signed "Truman H. Newberry, by J. O. Murfin, his attorney at law and in fact," in which are made charges of excessive and unlawful expenditures by or on behalf of Henry Ford in the late Michigan senatorial election and of irregularities.

I beg to say, in as emphatic language as parliamentary rules will permit, that these charges and insinuations are wholly false, and they only furnish additional reasons why an immediate investigation should be ordered, which Mr. Ford has been asking for ever since the primary, and which has been opposed by Mr. Newberry and his representatives from that time until this.

No money or other thing of value was expended by Mr. Ford either in primary or election, and no moneys were expended in his behalf in the primary. The expenditures made in the election were made by the nonpartisan Ford-for-Senator committee and by the Democratic State central committee, both of which committees have reported in utmost detail, under the oaths of their respective treasurers, their expenditures, which were all lawful disbursements.

We have the honor to again petition and request an immediate investigation by your honorable body.

HENRY FORD,
By ALFRED LUCKING,
His Counsel.

JANUARY 28, 1919.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 2784. An act to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916;

S. 3384. An act to amend the public building act, approved March 4, 1913; and

H. R. 13708. An act providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Peru, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 670) thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate resolution 399, directing the Secretary of State to report to the Senate whether the claims for damages suffered by American citizens in the Republic of Mexico have been presented to the Government of Mexico, and what steps have been taken to prosecute such claims, etc., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 671) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 5470) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Plymouth, Mass., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5471) for the relief of John A. Gauley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 5472) to establish within the Department of the Treasury a bureau for the regulation and supervision of the export of savings from the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 5473) to amend an act approved March 3, 1891, incorporating the National Conservatory of Music of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 5474) to amend section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5475) granting a pension to William Campbell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 5476) granting an increase of pension to Caspar Hopp; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 5478) granting the consent of Congress to the Fall Branch Coal Co. to construct a bridge across Tug River; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 5479) for the relief of lock masters, lockmen, and other laborers and mechanics employed by the United States Government in the locks and dams of the Kanawha River in West Virginia; to the Committee on Claims.

GILA RIVER DAM.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I introduce a bill providing for the construction of a dam across the Gila River at or near San Carlos, in the State of Arizona, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table. I give notice that next week I shall submit some remarks on the bill.

The bill (S. 5477) providing for the construction of a dam across the Gila River at or near San Carlos, in the State of Arizona, was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. PHELAN) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the relief and care of nonreservation Indians in California in destitute circumstances, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000,000 to carry out the purposes mentioned in section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of watersheds of navigable streams, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, recently I gave a wholly unnecessary notice, but the usual one, that to-day I would address myself to the resolution which I presented some weeks ago, and which it was my expectation on this occasion to call from the table and to have considered by the Senate. The pendency of the measure, however, that is before us now precludes me from taking up the particular resolution, but, nevertheless, the time being propitious, I wish to address myself to it and to the present situation in Russia.

On the 12th day of December last I introduced a resolution asking the State Department to define to us the policy of the United States toward Russia.

I was mighty lonely then, Mr. President, in the presentation of that subject matter. To-day, sir, I have my warrant here in the letters of mothers and fathers and wives of men who are suffering and who are dying in Russia. It became obvious to me that this resolution would not be acted upon by the Foreign Relations Committee, and subsequently I introduced the resolution, of which I speak to-day, expressing the opinion of the Senate that our troops should be withdrawn from Russia. Until the introduction of my first resolution, our relations with Russia, the activities of our soldiers there, and our policy in fighting, after the conclusion of the war with Germany, with another people against whom we never had declared war, had scarcely been mentioned publicly, and the subject, apparently, was one from which the supposedly popular branch of our Government timidly shrunk. In the last month and a half, however, a very healthy discussion has been stimulated within and without this body, and the American people have learned for the first time during this period a little, though not much, of American troops still battling on foreign soil. My original resolution was received, as I presumed it would be, in hot indignation and resentment by the part of the press which has rejoiced in its attitude of merely echoing approval of whatever the administration might do, but the subject matter has been taken up by that portion of the press of America which yet is free. Legitimate discussion has been stimulated, and our people, at last, by a modicum of free expression, have been faintly heard. What I sought to accomplish originally has in part been realized, and I think it no exaggeration to say that while the Senate, yet under the spell of the strange psychology of war, may yield its assent to a policy concerning which it was not consulted and about which it has not been informed, and which is at variance with our professions and violates our Constitution, the people of the country, emerging from this psychosis, and now far in advance of their representatives, with practical unanimity favor not only the original resolution but also the one now under discussion.

The peace conference recently has issued a formal statement concerning Russia, which, apart from its expression of esteem and love for the Russian people, asks all of the factions to meet in the Sea of Marmora on the 15th day of February. We are wholly in the dark as to what is contemplated when all parties meet upon an almost uncharted island in a distant sea; but we are becoming accustomed to the open diplomacy which in daily communiques with few words telling nothing soothe the perturbed spirits of the democratic peoples of the world. Because I assume that an address couched in such friendly language, specifically recognizing the revolution and disclaiming any desire to interfere in Russia's internal affairs, is but the initial step in a carefully prepared and thoroughly accepted plan of all the powers for the settlement of every question respecting Russia, I will not speculate upon the possibilities nor discuss the pronunciamento which has added to the case only the knowledge of the extraordinary affection in which the Russian people are held by the allies.

My interest has been in America's policy and in the soldier boys of the Republic, who, seemingly, for months were forgotten by their Government. My prime interest and concern yet are these American boys. The action of the peace conference thus far leaves these American boys where we discovered them a month and a half ago, and, so far as they are concerned, unless we take it for granted that they are to be withdrawn immediately after the 15th day of February, their situation is no different than when this subject first was broached. I ask for them nothing more than I ask for all American troops on foreign soil. I ask for us an American policy.

I am quite aware that there exist two distinct lines of policy for our country in the near future to pursue. I know that in this body the line of demarcation between these two policies is becoming increasingly plain. Recently the Republican floor leader, in an epoch-making speech, stated with clarity and precision his view of our future policy. With logical force and plainly he stated that he deemed it essential by the peace terms immediately to create the following:

1. A Jugo-Slav State.
2. A Czecho-Slav State.
3. The security of Greece.
4. Albania.
5. Montenegro.
6. Roumania.
7. Armenia.
8. Syria.
9. Palestine.
10. Poland.
11. The independence of Russia's Baltic Provinces, thus: 1, Finland; 2, Esthonia; 3, Lavonia; 4, Courland; 5, Lithuania; 6, Ukrainia.

And, in addition, that we must take and hold ample security from Germany and Austria.

I will not quarrel with his creation of the various new nations. But the distinguished Senator prescribes our future duty in this language:

> We must do our share in the occupation of German territory which will be held as security for the indemnities to be paid by Germany. We can not escape doing our part in aiding the peoples to whom we have helped to give freedom and independence in establishing themselves with ordered governments, for in no other way can we erect the barriers which are essential to prevent another outbreak by Germany upon the world. We can not leave the Jugo-Slavs, the Czecho-Slavs, and the Poles, Lithuanians, and the other States, which we hope to see formed and marching upon the path of progress and development, unaided and alone.

There is but one conclusion from the language used, and that is that after the creation of the 16 nations the duty devolves upon the United States, in part at least, to maintain these nations and aid them in establishing themselves with ordered governments by America's soldiers. I will not subscribe to this doctrine. I will not for one instant concede that it is the duty of the Republic to maintain order in a Jugo-Slav or a Czecho-Slav State, in Albania or Montenegro, in Roumania or Armenia, in Syria, Palestine, Poland, Finland, Esthonia, Lavonia, Courland, Lithuania, or Ukrainia. I am opposed to American boys policing Europe and quelling riots in every new nation's back yard. The perils of such a course to the Republic seem to me obvious. Aside from the material aspect—and you may ever keep in mind that the establishment and maintenance, in part by us, of these distinct peoples must be paid for by our already overburdened taxpayers—I would not shed the blood of American boys in the internal disturbances of an Esthonia, Lavonia, Courland, a Lithuania, or Ukrainia. I decline to be frightened now by the "German menace." Germany is whipped and thoroughly whipped. The central empires, in the language of the President, are in process of liquidation. The German Army has been practically demobilized; her ordnance has been relinquished; her means of transportation delivered; her fleets surrendered; her towns occupied. She is involved in such civil strife that it is doubtful if there will be a stable government with which a peace may be made. She has been so thoroughly disabled that she could not, a few days ago, resist a small advancing Polish army. She is suffering just retribution for her offenses. The central empires are incapable of aggressive action now. Our help, therefore, to the 16 nations which would be created "in establishing themselves with ordered governments" must be the aid which our arms would give to one faction or another in these new States, and I am not ready to shed American blood for any faction of any foreign State or in maintaining the government in any Baltic province. It is staggering to speculate upon the number of armies and the hundreds and thousands of American boys that would be required in these 16 nations. It is time for an American policy. Bring home American soldiers. Rescue our own democracy. Restore its free expression. Get American business into its normal channels. Let American life, social and economic, be American again.

I heard it said recently upon the floor of the Senate that the President had a most difficult task abroad. I recognize this, and wish that some real aid could be extended to him in the one possible accomplishment which may be his. I listened with rapt attention to the scholarly and statesmanlike address of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania recently, the point of which, as I understood it, was that we should at once conclude our peace with our foes and bring our boys home, leaving to subsequent determination the formation of a league of nations. I take it that he is no more opposed to a league of nations than I am; and I am very frank to say that if the President can return to the United States with a league of nations which does not relinquish our sovereignty and which in reality will be a preventive of future wars, I shall welcome most gladly and enthusiastically this great accomplishment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator from California if I should ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. If a league of nations is formed of the character defined by the Senator—that is, if we are to have a league of nations—I have forgotten the exact language which was so well expressed by the Senator, and will he kindly repeat it?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The language I used was: "I am very frank to say that if the President can return to the United States with a league of nations which does not relinquish our sovereignty and which in reality will be a preventive of future wars, I shall welcome most gladly and enthusiastically this great accomplishment."

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would tell us how we can have a league of nations that will not relinquish any part of our sovereignty and yet will prevent future wars?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg the Senator from Missouri will pardon me from entering into an intimate discussion of the subject this morning. At some future time I shall be glad to discuss it with him.

But America wants peace. It has achieved its great primal idealistic purpose and crushed a ruthless militarism. I reecho the words of the great commander of the Union forces in the Civil War immediately upon surrender of his adversary, "Let us have peace." Let us have peace and get out of Europe. On the 11th day of November the armistice was signed. Two months and a half have passed. The censored dispatches from Paris are conveying to us now the news that it is hoped the conference may conclude its labors in June and we are being prepared, apparently, for a second trip some time in the summer by our Chief Executive to Europe. I would not minimize, of course, the magnitude of his task, but I have a very distinct recollection that much of it has already been agreed upon. Because of prior agreement among our cobelligerents the idealism of the President is likely to be severely taxed, and his difficulties will be manifold. But the pitiless logic of events, the ironclad prior understandings of our allies, have lessened his labors and reduced to a minimum the subjects with which he must deal. He announced in January, 1918, and subsequently, fourteen peace points. The first of these—

> Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

we have had adequately demonstrated to us. The language of this covenant by bitter experience we have now learned is perfectly plain; in the interpretation it has been distorted and misunderstood. The senior Senator from Idaho has been insistent in his advocacy of peace point No. 1. For it, and for the other 13 peace points, we have been told that our soldiers gladly and cheerfully fought and died in France, but the senior Senator from Idaho, and others who thought as he did, with a singular obtuseness, have insisted "open covenants of peace, openly arrived at" mean what the words import. We should have known when we distinctly announced this particular point, for which our soldiers suffered and bled and died, we meant it in a Pickwickian sense only, and spoke the usual language of diplomacy. Anyone not affected with a mental strabismus ought readily to understand that when we say "open covenants of peace, openly arrived at," we mean "secret covenants of peace, secretly arrived at," and, after their arrival, doled out in homeopathic doses to an ignorant and ill-informed populace.

The second peace point was—

> Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

and is quite as plain to him who reads with intelligence as was peace point No. 1.

But we need not further discuss peace point No. 2. It has been lost for a considerable period now in historical mystery, and rests in oblivion with the unrealized dreams of the Akound of Swat and the Maharajah of Ruritania. Peace points three, for the removal of economic barrier; four, for the reduction of national armaments; and five, for the impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the interests of the populations concerned with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined, apparently have been submerged in weightier questions and no longer agitate the overburdened minds of statesmen. The sixth peace point, regarding Russia, I will mention hereafter. All of the other peace points, with the exception of the league of nations, deal with territorial adjustments, as does indeed No. 5. Now, the difficulty of the President in interpreting his peace points as to territorial acquisitions is that long ago England, France, and Italy reached their conclusions, and the President is up against the contracts, signed, sealed, delivered, and in the pockets of the allies. The secret treaties which were executed before our entrance into the war were quite definite in form, and apportioned territories to the three great belligerents, and also to Russia. These secret treaties, with the elimination of Russia, I feel sure, are deemed effective and binding; nor do I doubt that substantially the territory they embrace will be divided in accordance with their provisions. If the President can break through the traditions of diplomacy; if he can revive and have adopted his peace points apparently discarded with the opening of the peace conference; if he can effect a disregard of the secret treaties entered into for territorial dispositions and acquisitions by the three great powers; and if he can compel the altruistic and idealistic peace of which he has so often spoken his will be the greatest achievement of any statesman of any time. My hopes and my prayers are with him in his extraordinary task.

But Russia was the subject of the sixth definite peace point enunciated by the President. From the time of the Russian revolution until long after the control of Russia by the Soviets and the cruel administration of Lenine and Trotsky the President often spoke to Russia and the Russian people, and always in gentle, kindly, and friendly fashion. His policy, which, by our acceptance, became the policy of this Nation, was distinctly enunciated in the memorable address of January, 1917. Although this policy, apparently, has been forgotten in our dealings with Russia, whether it will ultimately be carried out may, perhaps, be determined by the fate of the other definite terms of peace prescribed by the President. The Kerensky government fell November 7, 1917, and the Soviets, with Lenine and Trotsky in command, came into power. On the 4th day of December we were asked to declare war against Austria, and, in the course of the address demanding a declaration of war against Austria, the President adopted the formula of the Bolsheviki of Russia, the formula under which they were making peace with Germany. He said:

> You catch, with me, the voices of humanity that are in the air. They grow daily more audible, more articulate, more persuasive, and they come from the hearts of men everywhere. They insist that the war shall not end in vindictive action of any kind; that no nation or people shall be robbed or punished because the irresponsible rulers of a single country have themselves done deep and abominable wrong. It is this thought that has been expressed in the formula "No annexations, no contributions, no punitive indemnities." Just because this crude formula expresses the instinctive judgment as to right of plain men everywhere it has been made diligent use of by the masters of German intrigue to lead the people of Russia astray and the people of every other country their agents could reach, in order that a premature peace might be brought about before autocracy has been taught its final and convincing lesson and the people of the world put in control of their own destinies.

At this time the Russian armies had practically disintegrated and the Russian Bolsheviki were negotiating with Germany. On January 8, while Russia was in collapse, and it was obvious that those in control of her government were about to make a shameful peace, the President, with full knowledge of the situation, presumably, had this to say:

> There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, of what it is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe. They call to us to say what it is that we desire, in what, if in anything, our purpose and our spirit differ from theirs; and I believe that the people of the United States would wish me to respond with utter simplicity and frankness. Whether their present leaders believe it or not, it is our heartfelt desire and hope that some way may be opened whereby we may be privileged to assist the people of Russia to attain their utmost hope of liberty and ordered peace.

This was said after two months of government by the Bolsheviki and after they had publicly proclaimed to the world their mode of government and what it was their purpose to do.

And, lest ye forget, I quote again the sixth of the celebrated peace points, uttered January 12, 1918:

The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

On February 11, 1918, when the proceedings of the peace conference between the Germans and the Bolsheviki were fully known and understood, the President thus spoke to us:

Peoples are not to be handed about from one sovereignty to another by an international conference or an understanding between rivals and antagonists. National aspirations must be respected. Peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their own consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.

Self-determination has fallen by the wayside with "open covenants of peace, openly arrived at." Or, perhaps, self-determination may have been used with the same delicate shades of meaning which have distinguished the use of "open covenants." All through our idealistic statements in this war runs the theme of self-determination and the rights of people for themselves to determine their own forms of government. It was the underlying principle which stimulated our judgments and aroused our enthusiasm. It is not the fault of those who coined the phrase, and those who have used it, that we may, perhaps, have misunderstood it, and that self-determination really means determination by ourselves of the kind of government others should have and then impressing that kind of government upon an unwilling and a rebellious people. With this possible explanation we may see with greater clarity the reason for our activities in Russia. During February the peace terms at Brest-Litovsk had been concluded and there remained but the ratification of those peace terms by the all-Russian congress of the Soviets.

I now deal with the historical events of the fateful month succeeding the President's address. So far as I am aware, what I now present has not been published in this country. I present it because it is the truth, and because upon us rests a heavy responsibility for what has since transpired in Russia. I will not be put in the attitude of defending in any degree the Soviet power or Lenine and Trotsky. Their fantastic theories no sane man, in my opinion, can indorse. But our dealing with Russia and the dealings of the allies with Russia have been not only an exhibition of the crassest stupidity, but have contributed to the awful tragedy there. Early in March the Soviet government officially presented to the allies certain questions, favorable answers to which every man then in Russia agreed would prevent a ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty by the all-Russian Soviet congress, and then there would have been a renewal of the war by Russia against Germany. A translation of the official document thus transmitted to the allies from the Soviet government is as follows:

In case (a) the all-Russian congress of the Soviets will refuse to ratify the peace treaty with Germany, or (b) if the German Government, breaking the peace treaty, will renew the offensive in order to continue its robbers' raid, or (c) if the Soviet government will be forced by the actions of Germany to renounce the peace treaty—before or after its ratification—and to renew hostilities—

In all these cases it is very important for the military and political plans of the Soviet power for replies to be given to the following questions:

1. Can the Soviet government rely on the support of the United States of North America, Great Britain, and France in its struggle against Germany?

2. What kind of support could be furnished in the nearest future, and on what conditions—military equipment, transportation supplies, living necessities?

3. What kind of support would be furnished particularly and especially by the United States?

Should Japan—in consequence of an open or tacit understanding with Germany or without such an understanding—attempt to seize Vladivostok and the Eastern-Siberian Railway, which would threaten to cut off Russia from the Pacific Ocean and would greatly impede the concentration of Soviet troops toward the East about the Urals—in such case what steps would be taken by the other allies, particularly and especially by the United States, to prevent a Japanese landing on our Far East, and to insure uninterrupted communications with Russia through the Siberian route?

In the opinion of the Government of the United States, to what extent—under the above-mentioned circumstances—would aid be assured from Great Britain through Murmansk and Archangel? What steps could the Government of Great Britain undertake in order to assure this aid and thereby to undermine the foundation of the rumors of the hostile plans against Russia on the part of Great Britain in the nearest future?

All these questions are conditioned with the self-understood assumption that the internal and foreign policies of the Soviet government will continue to be directed in accord with the principles of international socialism and that the Soviet government retains its complete independence of all nonsocialist governments.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator if he purposes to state what evidence there is of the authenticity of the document that he has just read?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have a photographic copy of it, sir. I have the photographic copy on my desk, if the Senator cares to see it.

Mr. LODGE. Who signed it?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The document was handed to Raymond Robins and a companion in what was known as the office of the council of the people's commissaries, Smolney Institute, Petrograd, by Commissaire of Foreign Affairs Trotsky, after a conference between Lenine, Trotsky, and Robins. It was transmitted to Washington and delivered to the ambassador of the United States.

The men who were then in Russia familiar with the situation, including the representative of England and the representative of the United States, advised their Governments to respond favorably. I have copies of the telegrams which were sent at that time to different Governments. But the communication was received, apparently, in indignant and contemptuous silence. I can hear the voices in this Chamber saying that this was right, that there should be no compromise with crime; that the allies were correct in their position in utterly refusing to deal, or to talk, or to communicate with this awful Soviet government. That it would have been in derogation of our dignity and would have been an affront to civilization to have responded, or to have united with this Soviet government in fighting Germany. I may think that you are entirely right in what I thus see passing through your minds. I may wholly agree with you that the civilized nations of the world could not without defilement touch this awful thing in Russia. And if this had been the attitude of our Government and other Governments, we might pass the incident as one of those unavoidable historical occurrences where idealism and civilization's champions must of necessity hold aloof from civilization's assailants. But during this period what was the Government of the United States doing? It could not, you say, have any dealings with these men who had set at defiance, in the language of one of the Senators upon this floor, the laws of God and man alike. In its virtuous indignation it could permit no communication of any sort, you assert, with cruelty, rapine, murder, and anarchy. But just before the Brest-Litovsk treaty was to be presented to the all-Russian Soviet congress the United States Government went to the city of New York, interviewed the socialists and extremists, and even anarchists, who preached lawlessness and destruction, and begged them for telegrams to be sent to Lenine and to Trotsky and to the Bolshevik government asking that the Bolsheviki continue the war. I read the headlines of one of the papers at that time:

United States lets "Reds" send messages to Bolsheviki. State Department cables their appeals to Russians to stand firm.

And in the body of the article appear these things:

The United States Government yesterday aided radical socialist and pacificist organizations in New York in sending to the Russian revolutionists cable messages urging them to resist the German invasion.

The messages were sent not only with the approval of the Government, but through the Government's agencies and at the Government's expense. * * * These messages were gathered by a person designated by the authorities and were sent to Washington to be forwarded through the State Department to Petrograd.

The socialists and extreme radicals in New York City were importuned for messages, and most of them responded. All of the messages were sent by the United States Government to the Bolsheviki at Petrograd. This, of course, is common knowledge, and has been common knowledge since its occurrence. I am not criticizing it. I am stating now something of the truth which we have carefully concealed during these months. You may say to me, of course, that this was a very different thing from communicating with the soviet government itself, and thus, in a measure, recognizing it. You may say that the exigency and the emergency justified the Government in using every means in its power to continue Russia's resistance to Germany. I may agree with you. But, if the emergency and the crisis justified the Government in using the anarchists of New York to communicate with the anarchists of Petrograd, it would have justified the United States Government answering the communication of the soviet government, without recognition of that government at all, and in encouraging it, by its answer, to renew the war with Germany. A very different proposition, you insist, between the Government itself communicating with the soviet government and the anarchists of New York communicating with their comrades in Petrograd. Perhaps so. But, beyond this, what did we do? With an authoritative and an official communication before us, which we were advised meant if we replied favorably that the soviet government would make war upon Germany, we refused to respond at all. And yet just before the meeting of the Soviet congress which was fixed for the week of Tuesday, March 12, the President of the United States himself cabled the Soviet congress.

Oh, we could not touch this awful thing in Russia! We could not touch it, with the document before us by which war might have been renewed, and under which the Brest-Litovsk treaty might have been repudiated in the all-Russian Soviet congress in the week of March 12, 1918. We could not be contaminated by touching such a thing, even for so good an end. But on March 12 the Official Bulletin of the United States Government tells us this:

President assures Russia that United States will aid in restoring its sovereignty. Following message from the President of the United States to the people of Russia through the Soviet congress has been telegraphed to the American consul general at Moscow for delivery:

"May I not take advantage of the meeting of the Congress of the Soviets to express the sincere sympathy which the people of the United States feel for the Russian people at this moment when the German power has been thrust in to interrupt and turn back the whole struggle for freedom and substitute the wishes of Germany for the purposes of the people of Russia.

"Although the Government of the United States is unhappily not now in a position to render the direct and effective aid it would wish to render, I beg to assure the people of Russia through the congress that it will avail itself of every opportunity to secure for Russia once more complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs, and full restoration to her great rôle in the life of Europe and the modern world.

"The whole heart of the people of the United States is with the people of Russia in the attempt to free themselves forever from autocratic government and become the masters of their own life." (Woodrow Wilson.)

During that week the meeting of the Soviet congress was postponed for several days in the hope that from the allied Governments would come a response to the proposition submitted, upon which a repudiation of the Brest-Litovsk treaty could be obtained from the congress. I do not care to speculate upon what might have transpired if the appeals of the Englishmen and Americans who were then in Petrograd to their Governments had been successful. I am relating to you only the facts. During this critical time in Russia the Germans were advancing through Finland. Marching and fighting with them were the Finnish White Guard. The army of the Bolsheviki were called the "Red Guard"; that of their opponents in Finland, the "White Guard."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator, of course, is familiar with the answer which was sent to the President's telegram. Does he intend to read it as a part of his remarks?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I have not it here. I trust that the Senator from Colorado will put in the answer if he desires.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would do so if I had it with me. I think the literal text should be placed in the RECORD, and I could only state the substance.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I shall be delighted to put it in the RECORD, too. I think the Senator does not mistake at all the point that is being made by developing this particular proposition; but if there are any other documents of any sort that the Senator wishes me to put into the RECORD in connection with these, I shall very gladly do it.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very glad to furnish it to the Senator later.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will search for it and put it in myself as well.

We have been very tender of Finland, and a part of the hundred million dollars recently appropriated to feed Europe is to be devoted to Finland. The historical fact, however, is that the only soldiers who fought the advance of the Germans were the Red Guard of the Bolsheviki. They whipped the White Guard, representing the so-called government of Finland, and they were forced back only when that government and the White Guard called the Germans to their aid. It is a historical fact, as well, that wherever the Red Guard fought those of their own country opposed to their revolution they won. They were whipped only when their opponents called in German troops. This was so not only in Finland but in Ukrainia, too. During this period repeatedly it was stated that the allies would intervene.

Intervention was never predicated upon the score of guarding supplies until the disingenuous August announcement of our Government. Intervention was suggested early in the year, and throughout the early months of 1918 it was a matter of common rumor and frequent discussion. During March the men who were most familiar with the Russian situation on the ground vigorously protested against this intervention, and no one protested more vigorously then, and at subsequent times, too, than did the ambassador of the United States Government. At Murmansk, early in March, because of the advancing Germans, the situation was acute, and then what happened? A mutual arrangement was made between the French and British and the Russian Soviets for the defense of the district of Murmansk. And during this month of March, nothwithstanding the horrible doctrine of the Bolsheviki, notwithstanding with an iron hand they were suppressing opposition, there was cooperation between them and the representatives of the Allied Governments in Petrograd. I learned, incidentally, that Maj. Thomas D. Thacher, of the law firm of Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett, New York, who was a member of the Red Cross mission to Russia, had been at Murmansk, and had seen the cooperation there existing between the French and British and the Bolsheviki, and on the 20th day of January I wired him, asking him succinctly to advise me of the facts. I received in response this telegram from him:

One company British marines, about 130, landed Murmansk March 5 or 6, pursuant invitation Murmansk Soviet, acting under telegraphic instructions Trotsky to accept all necessary aid from allies. Before landing supreme military command Alexandrovsk and entire Murman railway granted by Soviets to committee, composed of Bolsheviki sailors, French military officer, and British military officer. This committee subject, however, complete control Murmansk Soviet. From this time until my departure March 22, French, British, and American military authorities in daily cooperation and complete harmony with local Soviet. Seventeen guns fired by British ship Glory as salute to Russian flag. Only flag visible red flag. Salute answered same number of guns, Russian cruiser Chesmar. Red Cross received effective and invaluable assistance from Soviet authorities at Murmansk as well as everywhere else in protection and transportation of supplies. Five hundred Czecho-Slovak troops in Murmansk, assisted by Soviet authorities, returned to France. Sailed on my ship. I trust that this will give you the necessary information. I neglected to add a statement of the fact that the Soviet authorities cooperated with the allied authorities in the protection of supplies at Kandalaxia, as well as at Murmansk. The supplies at Kandalaxia were, of course, more exposed to the attack of Finnish white guards, who were then cooperating with the Germans.

I received yesterday a letter from Col. Raymond Robins concerning the closing paragraph in the story of George Creel recently published. That closing paragraph of Mr. Creel is as follows:

Russia was a hard fight to lose. It seemed for a while that we should surely win, and to this very day I believe that the people were with us then and are with us now. But the political control of Lenine and Trotsky abolished the freedom of the press and turned the power of the Government against us. Our men were the last to leave Petrograd and Moscow. Mr. Sisson stayed until the ultimate danger to secure the documents that proved Lenine and Trotsky to be German agents and then slipped out through the far reaches of Finland. Mr. Bullard and his force transferred to Vladivostok, from which point he began working back into European Russia with the allies.

One real result was achieved. Intensive work was carried on in the prison camps of Russia, and thousands of Czecho-Slovaks and Jugo-Slovaks learned of the purposes and power of America, receiving thereby the courage and inspiration that had its climax in the march of the Czecho-Slovak legion from the Ukraine to Vladivostok.

Col. Robins writes me:

The inclosed clipping from the last page of George Creel's eight pages of self-laudation in February's Everybody's Magazine suggests that Mr. Creel is unable to relate facts. The facts are:

The President's speeches were printed on the Bolsheviki government presses by special permission of that government. They were distributed under government frank and posted on the dead walls of Petrograd by the Bolsheviki posting service.

The money for this work was drawn from the Petrograd State Bank by special O. K. of the Bolsheviki government. The President's speech of January 8 was sent over the private wire of the Bolsheviki government to Brest-Litovsk by order of Lenine, and I secured the order for its transmission in the presence of Mr. Sisson.

Mr. Sisson fled from Petrograd on the 4th of March, 1918, shouting that the Germans would take the city within a few days in collusion with the Bolsheviki. The American Red Cross was feeding starving children and evacuating war supplies from Petrograd under Bolsheviki protection in quantity until the 1st of May, 1918.

The allied military missions were helping to train the Bolsheviki Red Army on the 1st of April, and the American ambassador was seeking, with the consent of the allied embassies, the cooperation of the American Railway Mission with the Bolsheviki government weeks after Mr. Sisson had fled in terror from Petrograd.

Mr. Bullard and all the American members of the committee on public information in Russia fled from Moscow on the 5th of May, reaching Archangel and suffering from the worst case of "buck fever" in my observation. They telegraphed the American ambassador to get them the permission of the British high commissioner, still in Petrograd, to get on the English ice breaker, which permission I secured for them, and they were on this ice breaker dressed in English uniforms for several weeks, while the American Red Cross was doing business as usual in Moscow, and English, French, and Japanese were still working for their Governments under the protection of the Bolsheviki government.

The American Red Cross mission did not leave Moscow until the 5th of October and Petrograd on the 16th of October in the full protection of the Bolsheviki government, some seven months after Mr. Sisson had fled in terror with his panic from reading some propaganda pamphlets and papers which were the amusement and contempt of honest and informed men.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us why the Red Cross had to leave when it did?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think that one unit just came out of there. I am not sure whether the Red Cross has wholly left. I do not know just its attitude, and I would not undertake to speak of it. I know I saw an officer day before yesterday who said he had just come across on a boat with a Red Cross officer who had just come out of Russia. In fact, however, I know nothing about it except the remark he made.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator tell the Senate what the mission of Col. Robins was in Russia and how long he was there?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. He was on a Red Cross mission. He was there until May, 1918, and my impression is for about 10 months or a year prior to that time. I do not pretend to be wholly accurate, but he was there during the Kerensky government and until May, 1918.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Can the Senator state whether or not after his return here he discussed the situation that has been so ably discussed by the Senator with either the Department of State or the President of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am very certain that he did not discuss the situation with the President of the United States. I do not know to what extent he discussed the matter with the Department of State. I am unable to say.

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator permit one more inquiry? Does he know why Col. Robins did not discuss it with the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I might give my personal opinion upon that subject, but I prefer not to do so. So I hope the Senator will excuse me. At any rate I think I am authorized to say this much, that the President did not discuss the situation with Col. Robins, nor did he ask to discuss the situation with Col. Robins.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was it not for the same reason that the President did not discuss with Gen. Bullard, who had been sent to Europe to investigate the situation there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator if he is not aware of the fact that Col. Robins remained in Washington after his arrival from Russia——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, he remained here a long period of time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For several weeks?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And he had with him all the documents and waited here in the hope that he might have an audience with the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think that is absolutely accurate, Mr. President.

When last I addressed the Senate upon this subject I asked certain questions of the Government. It is unfortunate that there is no method by which our Government may be interrogated and no means, except that of a majority vote here, by which information may be obtained for our people. I wish it were possible so to amend our system that upon this floor the appropriate official could be asked legitimate questions and compelled to respond. No answer has been made, of course, to the questions that I asked, because the implication in every question is known by the department to be true. Men are in this country to-day who can establish every single fact suggested, and if this body or the Foreign Relations Committee really desire information, if they wish to tell the mothers and the fathers and the wives of the men who are freezing in Russia to-day just what the facts are, they have at their disposal the evidence, and it can be brought before them upon the briefest notice.

Russia, Mr. President, is a marvelous country. It contains one-sixth of the earth's surface, with fertility of soil and wealth in mineral resources surpassing those of any other part of the earth. This Soviet government to which our President for us spoke so kindly, begged us for economic aid and wished to make us the most-favored Nation. We, in the rigidity of our virtue, though asking the aid of the anarchists in our midst, with the Bolsheviki over there, and though publicly proclaiming our friendship and our love, would not accept the proffer. Weak and vacillating, stupid, and ignorant has been our policy with Russia. We solemnly promised we would not intervene, and then, prating of our love for the Russian people, we did intervene. Prating about guarding stores at Archangel we advanced from 100 to 300 miles from that port, took and burned little Russian towns, and upset little Soviet governments. In the name of protecting military supplies, which were offered to us again, and again, and again, and which we could have had for the asking, we shot down Russian peasants and our boys are shot down by them. The Senator from Nebraska insists our only purpose in landing at Archangel was to protect the stores. Our only advance beyond Archangel was to prepare military bases. He is wrong. We were marching down from Archangel—and the facts will demonstrate it—that we might make conjunction with the Omsk Government and might perfect the ring of steel which we had thrown around interior Russia, and which was starving innocent women and children. The Senator from Virginia gravely speaks of the German menace. What German menace since November 11? Are our people children to be lulled into repose by such stuff as this? The very learned and logical Senator from Colorado tells us that we are not making war upon Russia; that Russia is making war upon us. Apparently his argument seems to be that if the Russians had not resisted when we advanced into their territory there would have been no conflict and no killing. What a strange and fantastic doctrine is this! If an army landed in New York, marched to Buffalo, and the people in central New York resisted and fought them, by that fact, then, New York was making war upon the invading army and the invading army was innocent of wrong. The French are under no illusions in this matter.

They are for intervention, and they believe they are intervening upon a small scale, too small, as they put it, now. They make no pretense that they wish supplies guarded. They wish Russians killed and another government set up. What hypocrisy upon our part to say to our people, and to the Russians, in our pronunciamento last year when we commenced our intervention, that we contemplated "no interference with the political sovereignty of Russia, no intervention in her internal affairs, not even in the local affairs of the limited areas which her military force may be obliged to occupy, and no impairment of her territorial integrity, either now or hereafter." No sooner had we landed at Archangel than we shot the Soviet government there existing out of town and set up a government of our own. No sooner did we go into the interior than everywhere we found a local soviet we shot it to death and set up our own mode of government. Then we tell our people that we intend no interference with the internal or local affairs of Russia!

What a commentary it is upon the power of this body and upon the power of our people that the State Department and the Government can not and will not answer concerning our troops in Russia. How the iron must enter the souls of those who have relatives there; of the mothers and fathers and the wives of men who were drafted to fight Germany, and then, when the war with Germany was ended, were forced to fight a war with Russia. Our Government can not answer concerning our troops, although the great preponderance of the forces at Archangel are American. Of necessity it must respond in indefinite and general terms. These troops are now under English command, and the Americans who are in the vicinity of Archangel, like good soldiers, are obeying their English commanders. I venture the assertion that in Washington, in the departments here, they know no more about what military action is contemplated or what our troops are about to do than the veriest novice upon the floor of the Senate. The American troops are under English command. Perhaps justly so, and I have no doubt well commanded; but it is because of that fact that no answer can be made as to the position of these troops or their military activities. An occasional belated story is given to us, the last of which we read on January 25, as follows:

"We have reports from Archangel," said Gen. March, "which were received here on January 24, and have been decoded. We had at Shenkursk a force which, at last reports, consisted of a detachment of British, two American companies, and two Russian companies. Manifestly this force has had out in that vicinity small patrols at times. The towns mentioned in the report are so small that we can not find them on our largest maps. The force at Shenkursk was attacked on three sides, and the report which was received at Archangel that day stated that they were forced to evacuate.

"The troops at a place called Ust-Pedenga, which I can not find on the map, were also compelled to evacuate under attacks by strong Bolshevist forces. Our troops took up a position midway between Shenkursk and Ust-Pedenga. Under attacks of 1,000 of enemy troops we retreated from Tania to a point 10 miles away therefrom. Tania is 18 miles west of Shenkursk.

"Under an attack from 200 of the enemy forces we retreated from Kodema, which is 25 miles from Shenkursk, to a point within 13 miles of that town. The enemy has strong patrols from Shegovari to Tania. Shegovari is 20 miles north of Tania, and to the right of Shenkursk.

"The Americans lost 10 enlisted men killed in action, 17 wounded, and 11 missing in the retirement. Near Ust-Pedenga, and later at Shegovari an enemy attack on the west was repulsed."

"Do we plan," was asked, "to reinforce the American unit in Russia in view of the fact that it seems to be retiring?"

"Shenkursk," replied Gen. March, "as scaled on the map, is apparently 190 miles from Archangel, and the allied forces representing four Governments, and the Russians, five Governments, have up there a force large enough to reinforce those men or have them fall back on them and hold the situation."

Gen. March was asked whether any recommendation had been received concerning the withdrawal of the American forces from the Archangel front.

The force now at Archangel—

He said—

was put in there by the allied Governments on the recommendation of Marshal Foch, and the military handling of that unit was thereupon turned over to the supreme commander; and whatever is done concerning reinforcing the unit will be done by him. The allies agreed upon a British commander in chief, and at the last reports he was in the front lines inspecting his troops, and I assume that the military part of it is in hand.

From this, apparently, all the roseate stories of the campaign in Russia may be discounted. Our brave boys had to retreat many miles through the ice and the snow and the rigors of an Arctic winter. They had to fight during this period in weather that few are accustomed to and none understand.

And what has been the result of it all? It is true we have a ring of steel that prevents food getting into Russia. It is true that we are starving women and children to-day in Russia, and that hands are lifted in supplication to God and in cursing this country for its activities. But is it not obvious to you that when we compel people in Russia to starve, who will starve? It will not be first the horrible Bolsheviki. It will not be your Lenines and your Trotskys. It will be the intellectuals and the bourgeois. It will be those whom we are pleased to term the very best people in Russia. As you contract this ring now, and as you prevent the natural flow of food from the granary of Russia, and you blockade her ports with gunboats, you are first starving the very people you do not wish to starve, and you are starving those who ought not to starve. If it had not been for this criminal policy of intervention, and this ring of steel that prevented food getting into internal Russia, Lenine and Trotsky, in my opinion, long ago would have fallen and the Bolsheviki would have been at an end. But by this foreign interference every base passion has been appealed to, every prejudice aroused, and even patriotism invoked. And the very act of intervention has enabled this grotesque government to last far beyond its allotted time, and to exercise its despotic sway in the name of public safety. How much have we contributed to the terror, to the rapine, plunder, slaughter, and massacre? There is a heavy reckoning some day for those who have been responsible for this wicked and this useless course in Russia. And the heaviest responsibility, the wrong which can never be atoned, is the shedding of American blood in Russia. It is to this phase I desire to arouse the Congress and to which, if I had the power and my voice would carry, I would arouse the people of the Nation. It is of American boys and American blood I am thinking. I would not give one American life in Russia for all the Bolsheviki spawned by centuries of tyranny and mad with the lust of a ruthless ephemeral power.

What I ask by this resolution is that our Government, which shrouds itself in mystery and which will not tell us or the people its intentions or its policies, may know our opinion that our troops should be withdrawn from Russia. I do not care how you view the situation, whether you favor armed intervention or whether you do not. If you favor armed intervention it is obvious that the scale upon which it has been undertaken is too small to accomplish lasting results. It has become painfully clear in the last few days that by the present intervention we merely hazard the lives of our men. It is equally clear that the people of England, and our own people, will not tolerate intervention upon a larger scale. Therefore, even if you favor intervention you should, for the protection of the lives of our soldiers, insist that those there, few in number and their position courting disaster, be immediately withdrawn. If you favor intervention, why do you not upon this floor, by resolution or otherwise, say so? If you believe in war with Russia, why not introduce an appropriate resolution and permit Congress to vote upon it in accordance with the Constitution, and permit our people to discuss it? Upon what theory can you justify war, without affirmative action by Congress? And that we are in an actual state of war at present in Russia the recent ominous news from there demonstrates only too plainly.

What a sorry spectacle we present! The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee endeavors to make explanations of our policy with Russia, but hastens to assert that he does not speak officially or authoritatively. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs gravely gives his views but prefaces them with the statement that he speaks neither officially nor authoritatively. Both of these gentlemen say we are simply protecting supplies. I reiterate that England is under no illusion respecting our purpose in Russia, and that France frankly proclaims it. The court organ, the New York World, says we are in Russia for the purpose of maintaining order. The various Russians who have showered us with pamphlets of late understand the situation full well. The most recent of the propaganda which has come to me is from a certain Col. Vladimir I. Lebedeff, who says:

Just at this time, the allied armies being at Vologda, the allies advised the officers' organizations to revolt simultaneously against the Bolsheviki in Ribinsk, Vladimir, Yaroslavl, and Murom, so as to encircle Moscow as with an iron ring.

In the declaration published by the State Department of our intervention it was stated "whether from Vladivostok or from Murmansk and Archangel, the only present object for which American troops will be employed will be to guard military stores which may subsequently be needed by Russian forces and to render such aid as may be acceptable to the Russians in the organization of their own self-defense." The charming naivete of this must have appealed to the Bolsheviki. We were landing troops for the sole purpose of guarding military stores which subsequently we would deliver to the Russians themselves. Of course, the intention of this utterance was to fool the people of the United States into believing American bayonets were necessary to protect Archangel stores from the Germans. It is never for an instant indicated nor is the language susceptible of any such meaning that these stores were to be protected from any kind of Russians who were not acting with the Germans. Our advance constantly into the interior, of course, makes it obvious that the guarding of supplies for Russians themselves was the veriest kind of pretense. In all of the months prior to our intervention daily the subject of intervention was hotly discussed.

In all these discussions there never was a question about protecting supplies except in the instance where the soviet government, in conjunction with the English and the French, at the very moment of the German advance in February and March, protected supplies at Murmansk. The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee scoffs at the idea that any war exists in Russia now, or that we are there participating in war with the Russians. I take it what he means is that it is just a little war, and because it is such a little war, it ought to be disregarded. It is a little war. It involves the lives of something over 5,000 American boys only. It touches the hearts of perhaps three times that number of anxious relatives in the United States. It is true, perhaps, that it is such a little war it involves only a few hundred lives, a few hundred maimed, a few hundred American graves on Russian soil, but to me, sir, one of those lives in Russia and one of these hearts bowed in anguish in America are more precious than all of the pretense of diplomacy or the protection of any government from the just wrath of a righteous public opinion.

Opinion upon this subject has crystallized in England. You may have observed recently a delegation of soldiers called upon Lloyd George and expressed their fear that they might be sent to Russia. He assured them they would not be. I have been interested in following the discussion which has been going on in England, and a portion of it I wish to bring to your attention. Indeed, as evidentiary matter, I have selected two newspapers, one British the other American, because of their high standing and the accuracy of their statements. I have taken the Manchester Guardian, one of the few great independent newspapers in the world. It certainly will not be accused of bolshevism or sympathy with men like Lenine and Trotsky. I have taken as well from the sedate precincts of the Old Bay State the Springfield Republican with its recent reviews of the Russian situation, and, without at length reading either, I desire to refer to a few excerpts.

Perhaps, Mr. President, I would serve no good purpose in reading these excerpts, and, if the privilege will be accorded to me, I should like to put into the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, various articles from the Manchester Guardian, dated December 6, December 19, December 24, and December 27, 1918, and two articles from the Springfield Republican, one of them dated January 5 and the other dated January 12, 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The articles referred to are as follows:

THE RUSSIAN SCANDAL.

Our present relations with Russia are about as indefensible as can be imagined. The foreign office, or those who control the policy of the foreign office, can hardly be ignorant of that—how should they be?—but, so far as appears, are preparing to cover one error with a greater error and to make bad worse. In the midst of the preoccupation of a great war the little war with Russia has received comparatively little attention, and it is hardly realized that, though the great war is over, the little war goes on, and, moreover, that if it is not stopped now or soon it is likely to become a very much larger war and a more and more intolerable and indefensible one, so intolerable and indefensible, indeed, that it is capable of producing grave reactions here, extending to the overthrow of a government. We originally embarked on this Russian adventure under wholly different circumstances, and for reasons, so far as reasons were given, which have no present application whatever. After the intervention by Germany in the civil war between the Reds and Whites in Finland and her virtual occupation of the country there was a real, if somewhat remote, danger that she might strike through Finland at the narrow strip of Russian territory which divides the north of Finland from the Arctic Ocean and establish for herself a naval station on the Murmansk coast, giving her access to the Arctic and a new outlet for her submarines. At a moment when the submarine war was at its height and Russia lay helpless and subservient there was reason, if not very urgent reason, since the district was extremely inaccessible and a long line of railway would have had to be built, for guarding against this peril. That was the extent of the danger and the extent of the need for our occupation. Its extension to Archangel, which is not ice free, and to a large stretch of country inland had no such justification. The occupation of Vladivostok, Russia's ice-free port in the Pacific, 5,000 miles away, followed by the advance with the cooperation of Japan westward into Siberia was, as a military measure, equally unjustified. Both these extensions of the original intervention were defended on quite other grounds. It was said that Russia had become the mere tool of Germany and that it was necessary, first, to prevent the further extension of Germany's influence and her increasing exploitation of Russian resources, and, secondly, to "reconstitute the eastern front." In this connection the happy discovery was made of scattered bands of Czecho-Slovak prisoners who, it was urged, must, in the first place, be rescued, and, in the second place, utilized in this process of reconstituting the eastern front.

So matters stood at the time of the collapse of Germany and the conclusion of the armistice. Obviously, every reason hitherto alleged, whether for the original occupation of the Murmansk coast or for the subsequent expedition to Archangel and Siberia had now disappeared. They were all in the nature of defenses against the attack of Germany, and there was no longer any attack or possibility of attack from Germany. Germany as a military power was dead; but were the defensive measures, the counterattacks, dead also? Not at all; they continue in full force. There is quite a prospect that they may be largely extended. For the moment, of course, there is a pause. Winter is no respecter of persons or of policies. Very soon Archangel will be frozen up and our army of occupation there will be frozen up also. In the east the Japanese have steadily and very sensibly refused to advance a mile farther. They have reached Lake Baikal, and beyond Lake Baikal they decline to go. So if we desire to extend our operations in this direction we shall have to do it ourselves, for America will certainly not assist us and will prudently follow the Japanese example. But there are other possible fields of operation. We have recently obtained access to the Black Sea. We are therefore now in a position to repeat in the extreme south of Russia our performances in the extreme north, and, as a matter of fact, it is credibly reported that the war office is now engaged in making a survey of the country. The Ukraine, under German and Austrian control, has become the refuge or dumping ground of a whole collection of Russian reactionaries of various sorts and sizes, and the same is true to a less extent of the Don country and other districts to the east. It would be easy to play into the hands of these gentry, as we have played into the hands of others of the same description in eastern Siberia, where a purely reactionary party has now dismissed the local popular (not Bolshevik) government and established a military government of its own.

But what conceivable justification, it may be asked, is there for any such proceedings? And how is it possible that any British Government should embark on so wanton and criminal an interference in the affairs of another nation? Such questions may, indeed, well be asked, but it is doubtful if they will receive any presentable answer; for the fact is that the real, though unavowed, reason for our previous interference is entirely different from the avowed reasons, and it is a little awkward, now that the avowed reasons have disappeared, to produce the real one—the more so as this is not a very nice reason or one which is likely to commend itself to reasonable people in this country or to our working class. That reason, of course, is that the war against Russia has from the first really been a war against that particular form of socialistic theory known as bolshevism.

We are no admirers of that theory. Applied to any western European country, we believe it would be disastrously subversive. Even in Russia we may doubt its permanence. But there it is; it has established itself; it has existed for more than a year. It is not weakening in power; all trustworthy information goes to show that it is gaining in power; that it has established order; that it meets with general support from some 80,000,000 people, whom it controls; that it is grappling successfully with the food problem; that it is promoting the popular arts, music, and the drama, and is preparing a great scheme of popular education—that, in fact, it is performing most of the normal functions of a government, and performing them with increasing success. These are the facts, but they do not suit the policy—the policy at least hitherto pursued—of our freedom-loving Government. The telegrams of the few British correspondents, including our own, who are still in a position to give authentic information, are ruthlessly censored or suppressed, and the Government goes on in its blind and foolish way, a way that can, if persisted in, lead only to discredit and disaster. This is the situation as we understand it. Bolshevism is to be suppressed by armed force, and in order to prepare people's minds for it and to lend it some color of justification, not only is truth as to the condition of Russia suppressed but currency is given to all kinds of wild statements and palpable exaggerations. The Bolsheviks are not angels from heaven. They have, like most revolutionaries, executed a good number of their enemies, but these executions have mostly taken place since the intervention of the allies gave encouragement to the counter-revolutionaries and made them more formidable. Mr. Litvinoff, who is an honest man and a Tolstoyan before he is a Bolshevik, puts the total number of executions since the Bolsheviks came into power at 400, half of them of ordinary criminals. That is probably an underestimate. If information were allowed to come through from other sources, we might get nearer the truth. This, then, so far as there is a policy, appears to be the policy. It has got to be changed. Perhaps the Government are already awakening to the fact, but find it difficult to get out of the mess they have themselves created. Let them take heart. It is easier now than it will be later. Every week, every month, that they stay in Russia and wage a war on Russia, which has lost every shred of avowable reason and has no justification, will make it more difficult to escape. If with the coming of spring they should see fit to resume or extend their military operations, it is well they should understand that it will not be tolerated in this country. The workers here are not going to send their sons to slaughter and be slaughtered against the workers of another country, against which we have never even declared war, and for the purpose of destroying a form of social economy with which some of them, at least, are in sympathy. If it is sought to check the progress of bolshevism and prevent its spread to this country, that is precisely the way to defeat the object. We prefer not to consider the possible further consequences of such reckless folly.

ADMIRAL KOLTCHAK AND LORD MILNER.

The campaign of Admiral Koltchak, the Siberian "dictator," against his old comrades in arms is developing. He has arrested another 27 of them, including M. Tchernoff, one of the foremost of the anti-Bolshevik socialists, and 12 other members of the constituent assembly. Their crime is that they do not accept him as dictator and that they proclaim him a sheer reactionary, a charge which has that sharpest of all stings—truth. The admiral's campaign against the Bolsheviks, however, is not moving equally prosperously. The chief Czech generals have resigned rather than do his work for him, and the whole Czech army is threatening to abandon the front and go home. That would mean the end of Admiral Koltchak's "dictatorship" and the whole miserable Siberian adventure. The admiral, however, expects the allies to induce the Czechs to stay on as his mercenaries (paid, of course, not by him but by the allies), to replace them, if and when they depart, by allied conscripts (thus doing their bit to make democracy safe), and to provide him liberally with the sinews of war. The finance of the "dictator" is characteristic. It will be remembered that the late Czar gained much credit at the beginning of the war by suppressing vodka. Vodka is the dictator's local financial stand-by. It brought in 1,000,000 rubles in August and 10,000,000 rubles in November, and its potentialities are "limitless," for there are a thousand million rubles of the stuff in stock. Thus, faithful to tradition, vodka is to be the rock on which the "dictator's" Russia is to be builded, just as it was of the Czar's Russia. Vodka and loans—for the "dictator's" foreign friends are to do most of the paying, though we should like somebody to tell us who is calling the tune. Koltchak is asking the allies to provide 60,000,000 rubles a month to keep him going. There is a further point. Many parts of Russia are starving. How many people realize that it is partly the allies who are responsible for starving Russia? We are blockading Russia so that no raw materials or machinery can enter the country or produce leave it. We are sustaining the blockade of Russia by the revolted provinces who used to supply her with most of her food and fuel. To what end this martyrizing of the Russian people? To what end this pouring out of British blood and British money?

To these questions, at long last, a British minister, Lord Milner, attempts a reply. Lord Milner does not say the Bolsheviks are German hirelings. He is not quite so ready as his colleagues to adopt, on the strength of forged documents, a theory which no competent authority sincerely believes. He says we went to Russia for two chief reasons—because the action of the Bolsheviks was assisting our enemies by releasing hosts of German troops and bringing Roumania down, and because we were under a moral obligation to save the Czecho-Slovaks. We are afraid that these reasons ignore a great many facts. We provided the Ukraine with money and arms to break away from Russia before the Bolsheviks made peace with Germany; indeed, our action was an important, perhaps the most important, factor in precipitating the treaty of Brest. Again, the Bolsheviks repeatedly expressed their willingness and their anxiety to let the Czecho-Slovaks leave Russia, and they contend that it was the allies who inspired them to stop in the hope of "reconstituting the eastern front." That, indeed, was the favorite argument for the expeditions to Russia—that it would bring Russia back into the war, whether the Russian people like it or not. We venture the assertion, in despite of Lord Milner, that the military adventures of the allies in Russia did nothing to bring defeat to Germany, but were in a military sense pure waste, to say nothing of the political loss. But be Lord Milner's reasons for intervention as good as they are bad, they no longer exist. The war with Germany is over. The Czecho-Slovaks can go home as soon as they like, or rather as soon as we let them, for it is the allies who are keeping them in Siberia when they want to go home. What then is our reason for maintaining war against Russia? Lord Milner says that we have induced some thousands of Russians—a very few thousand, in fact—to fight on our side and we can not abandon them to "the unspeakable horrors of Bolsheviki rule" until they can train, arm, and defend themselves. As the Bolsheviks have a large army and the anti-Bolsheviki parties are better at fighting one another than at fighting the Bolsheviks, it looks as though we shall be at war with Russia forever, on Lord Milner's principle. Would it not be cheaper to come to terms with the Bolsheviks, safeguarding the lives of our Russian friends, which would be perfectly easy? The Bolsheviks are begging for an armistice, but we will not condescend to listen to them. Why? The true reason peeps out at the end of Lord Milner's letter when he speaks of our duty to prevent "barbarism" spreading all over Russia. In Russia we are fighting neither against the Germans nor for the Czecho-Slovaks nor for the Russian anti-Bolsheviks. We are fighting against a form of the State and a conception of property which we dislike, and which we have good reason to dislike, but which it is not our business to overthrow by force of arms in another country. That is why we are in Russia.

THE OUTLOOK THIS CHRISTMAS.

The fifth Christmas since the war began is not yet the Christmas of peace. Fighting has been suspended between the original belligerents, nor is there any prospect of its being resumed. Turkey, Austria, Bulgaria, and Germany have neither the will nor the means to take up arms again before the final peace is ratified. All this is an immense boon, but we should not forget that the old war has either actually given place or is in danger of giving place to a new war. The allies are directing or sustaining several campaigns against the Moscow government, and the fragmentary States of the disrupted Russian and Austrian Empires are engaged in a conflict with one another, which is not the less ferocious because it is obscure. These, perhaps it will be said, are but small dark patches on an otherwise brilliant prospect. Nobody, however, knows what dimensions the war against Russia may take on, just as nobody knows what this war is about. Still more disturbing, nobody can foretell what vast explosive forces may be released and transmitted throughout the world by such a reckless enterprise. Old Europe was light of heart when it set out to extirpate revolution in France, and the end of it all was that old Europe collapsed in blood and fire under the blows of Napoleon. Of course, history may not repeat itself, but the statesman who stakes much on the chance that causes will not produce their probable consequences is not exactly prudent. All the miserable conflict in eastern and southeastern Europe between nation and nation has a very direct relation to events in Russia. Russia is girded round with primitive race passions, the fierce tyranny of intolerant pride and aggressive exuberance. That constitutes an immense mass of inflammable material. A cautious statesmanship would hasten to extinguish the war with Russia before it extends and consumes great part perhaps of Europe. When we see European statesmanship, on the contrary, planning to develop, instead of ending, hostilities against Russia, we can not think the outlook too comforting.

The moral flaw thus revealed is as unfavorable to excessive optimism as the intellectual flaw. The war against Russia has the two characteristic defects of the pre-1914 system—the secrecy of its inception, its conduct, and its aims, and the conviction that force is the best of arguments and can be trusted to prevail.

THE ALLIES AND RUSSIA.

The allies, according to M. Pichon, are desirous of extirpating bolshevism in Russia, but they are not going to expand their military intervention. If the allies were united in extirpating poverty outside Russia, it would please the allied peoples and benefit them much more. Bolshevism inside Russia is the concern of the Russian people, not of the allied governments. We can not imagine anything more reckless than an adventure of this kind at a time like this. Some perception of this fact seems to have dawned upon the allied governments, perhaps with the help of President Wilson. That explains, presumably, the decision to resist the pressure of the Russian exiles anxious for an unlimited allied expedition. But the policy of a limited military commitment is a worthless compromise. No man knows where it will end, no man knows what result it will produce, no man can safely predict of it anything except that it will prolong civil war in Russia indefinitely, and delay indefinitely the ending of the starving of the Russian people by the blockade and the restoration of tolerable conditions. The allies can either have war with Russia or be at peace with Russia. There is nothing between. The allied governments must choose the one or the other. They would be wise to choose peace quickly.

[From the Springfield Republican, Jan. 5, 1919.]

FRENCH AND RUSSIAN SITUATION.

It now seems settled that France, at least, intends to persist in the unhappy half-way course which has worked such disaster in Russia. Last week mention was made of the reported abandonment of the great project of sending armies into Russia to overthrow the Lenine government. But apparently while the allies could not agree on this "thorough" method of dealing with bolshevism by attacking it at its supposed source, France can not make up its mind either to abandon intervention. Foreign Minister Pichon last Sunday flatly contradicted the inference of a Socialist deputy that this was what he had meant, and made the further statement that while intervention was inevitable its purpose "was not offensive for the time being but defensive." Later an offensive might be necessary to destroy bolshevism, but such an operation must be carried out by Russian troops, of whom there were at the present time, he said, 100,000 at Odessa.

By "defensive" operations he meant, of course, not defending French territory, but preventing the spread of bolshevism that is to-day preventing the extension of the Lenine government's power over those parts of the former Russian Empire, which it does not yet control. Yet this professed purpose hardly covers the case of the present intervention of the French, apparently without the cooperation of their allies in the Ukraine. For the Republican forces, which the French seem after some hesitation to have decided to attack are not pro-Lenine, and it is doubtful if they can be called Bolshevist except in the extended sense in which that term of opprobrium is coming to be applied to revolutionists in general. It will be recalled that a fortnight ago we had word of the sweeping progress of the Republican forces under the popular leader, Petlura. They took Odessa and other Black Sea ports and also occupied Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine. Apparently it was they and not, as an earlier muddled or censored dispatch indicated, the White army of Gen. Denikin that overthrew the Cossack hetman, Gen. Skoropadkin, who with German support had carried on a counter-revolution in the Ukraine. On the contrary, Skoropadkin appears to have gone over to the allies after the collapse of Germany, and to have acted upon their advice in declaring for a reunion of the Ukraine under the government which he was to set up, with the Russian governments organized by the reactionary dictators, Gen. Denikin and Admiral Kolchak.

This was wholly contrary to the will of the people of the Ukraine, but a Pole of high rank, who lately escaped from Kiev, is probably mistaken in attributing the popular revolt which followed to this declaration for union. A much more probable cause is that Skoropadkin, Denikin, and Kolchak all represent the propertied interests and aim at undoing the work of the revolution, especially in regard to the distribution of the land. In the Ukraine, which takes in most of the famous "black-earth" belt, in which the great landlords stuck tighter to their vast estates than in northern Russia, the agrarian question is specially acute, and this issue seems to have united the peasantry and the lower and middle classes of the cities to a degree not found in Russia proper. The movement headed by Petlura, in short, has all the marks of a genuine popular movement, and the way in which it burst out everywhere all at once shows that it had gained much headway before the censors allowed mention of it.

When the new tidal wave of revolution swept down on Odessa and the other seaports the French, who had no adequate forces on hand, contented themselves with protecting the docks and wharves with their naval vessels, and later landing a force were said to have regained about a third of the city. Now we are told that a French army is to operate from Odessa, and that another army, under French command, but presumably in the main Roumanian, is marching from Roumania to attack Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine.

Of the military side of these operations it would be premature to speak, because so little is known of the force involved. But politically it can at once be said that the adventure inspires serious misgivings, if only because the French foreign office, in some ways the most reactionary now left in Europe, has shown such unlimited capacity for blundering in its dealings with the revolution. It is now supporting a reactionary "unionist" government, yet last year the Ukraine had hardly declared its independence when the French recognized its Government, lent it $35,000,000 (surely the worst bet ever made), and sent a military mission. The theory was that since the Ukraine was against the Bolsheviki, and since the Bolsheviki were pacifists and pro-Germans, the Ukraine must be proally and eager to go on fighting for the entente. But that military mission got to Kiev just in time to see the Ukraine break faith with the Bolsheviki and negotiate a separate treaty with the enemy. M. Pichon has a reason to feel sore about that $35,000,000, but it should be noted that the hasty advance of cash to a Government simply because it was revolting from the Bolsheviki showed a too rigid and fallacious logic. In real life things do not arrange themselves as this or that; they may be something else, and Ukraine was the something else. It may be added in extenuation that French policy in Russia has from the beginning of the revolution been under inconceivable pressure from the half-crazed investor. For people whose hard-earned savings are menaced by a social cataclysm in a remote country the utmost sympathy may be felt, but there is no worse influence for a statesman than a panic over investments.

It is in France, for this reason, that we must look for the bitterest hostility toward the revolution, and strange as this may seem in view of the preeminence of France in revolution. Of exceptional interest, now that France has drifted into war with Russia, is the frank account given by the historian, Ernest Lavisse, when the revolution was but two months old, of the friction between the two countries:

"If we have misunderstood the Russian revolution, the revolutionaries, on their side, have not been fair to us. We looked for some expression of warm sympathy toward France, who first proclaimed the rights of man, and whose successive revolutions have contributed so much in the downfall of the old régime in Europe. But the Russian revolutionaries have greeted us with black looks. They reproach our Republic with having made too easy a pact with czarism and with having permitted and even supported the very equivocal activities of the Russian police in France. On this last point they are only too well justified. But they don't appreciate in a spirit of fairness the reasons for the alliance between the French Republic and the Russian Czar. France lived under perpetual threat of a German attack. * * * Certainly this alliance was repugnant to our traditions, but sheer necessity forced it on us."

Hardly less serious than the situation in Ukraine is that in western Siberia, where a new danger is revealed in a dispatch from Carl Ackermann, who has been at Omsk, in which he states on November 24 the Czech soldiers "voted against an offensive against the Bolsheviki which had been planned and ordered." This is striking in the first place because it shows the Czechs, whose prowess and good conduct have won admiration, as having absorbed in Russia the Bolshevist idea of the referendum to the army of the orders issued by the high command. This detail gives point to what has been said of the infectiousness of bolshevism and its influence upon all the armies that are sent to fight the Bolsheviki.

But for the Czechs there is the justification that they feel, says Mr. Ackermann, that they have been betrayed by the allies. Their feeling may be unjust, but at all events the allies exploited the accidental presence of the Czechs in Russia without having worked out a plan or even having agreed on a general policy, and the Czechs, like the Roumanians and the Serbians, have been left in the lurch. When the decision to have them stay in Russia was announced attention was called in these reviews to the danger of making so immensely important a decision as invading Russia, a matter to be determined on broad lines, turn on the mere accident that a small force of foreign soldiers was occupying a good strategic position thousands of miles into the interior of the empire. There were 60,000 Czechs getting on very well in a land of 160,000,000 people, because there was no serious hostility; they were Russia's allies leaving Russia. Why should there be hostility? Here and there German agents stirred up trouble, but it is now tolerably clear that there would have been no difficulty in getting the Czechs out of Russia, if that had been desired. Even the treacherous hostility of Trotsky seems to have been due to the threats of intervention and his belief that if the Czechs got to Vladivostok they would join the invading entente armies.

Of the part played by the United States Government in this sorry affair it is too soon to speak, but it is certain that its action was taken in the supposed interest of the Russian people. But the fear that its action would be misunderstood in Russia has been borne out by the result, and is illustrated in a telegram sent by the president of the soviets of central Siberia, which Mr. Ackermann quotes:

"From Russia to Vladivostok are moving 60 echelons of Czecho-Slovak troops at the disposal of America, ostensibly on their way to France. In view of the hostile attitude of international imperialism and the threats of a foreign landing at Vladivostok the central executive committee of the Siberian soviets considers a concentration there of forces dangerous and inadmissible."

The American official shares in commitments which the allies did not in fact carry out is shown in a dispatch from Consul General Poole at Moscow to the Czechs at Samara:

"You may inform the Czecho-Slovak leaders that pending further notice the allies will be glad, from the political point of view, to have them hold their present positions. On the other hand, they should not be hampered in meeting the military exigencies of the situation. It is desirable, first of all, that they should obtain control of the Trans-Siberian Railroad, and, secondly, if this is assumed, at the same time, if possible, retain control over the territory they now dominate."

Is not this a curious dispatch to send—from Moscow? Has the Lenine government had altogether a square deal, to say nothing of the Czechs?

Their vote against another offensive fits with all that we have had from Siberia and helps to explain the hostility toward them shown by the London Times correspondent, who was specially angry at them for protecting the members of the constituent assembly from arrest by the new dictator, Kolchak. By their aid the delegates were able to escape to Ufa, in European Russia, where the all-Russian government had its capital before it went to join the Siberian government at Omsk. At Ufa, said the correspondent of the Times, they "continue to fulminate against the Omsk government," though their power for mischief there was limited by lack of the support of the Czechs. But this week the Moscow government claims the capture of Ufa. Was it a military victory, or have the leaders there abandoned the allies because of the Kolchak coup d'état and gone over to Lenine? If the allies have not been fair to the Czechs, have they been fair, either, to the Russian moderates who have been willing to cooperate in restoring Russia? There is much excuse for them if, after narrowly escaping arrest by a czarist military dictator, they have finally joined forces with the Bolsheviki; but why should the allies have let them be forced into that dilemma?

The refusal of the Czechs to attack the Bolsheviki also helps to interpret the announcement made to the French Chamber of Deputies by M. Pinchon last Sunday that Perm had been captured by an anti-Bolshevik army of Russians. It may be so; and it may even be that it was, as he declared, a tremendous victory, with 16,000 Bolsheviki killed or captured, though all news from Russia has to be scaled down. The victory, it is true, was suspiciously timely with a new adventure in the Ukraine being floated against protest, and M. Pinchon has not shone as an authority on events in Russia. But for the present we have no evidence one way or another. Vladivostok doubles the number of prisoners, but is a remote source. The point of interest is that the French foreign secretary made a virtue of the Russians acting alone and hid from the French Parliament the news, undoubtedly barred in France by the censorship, that the Czechs had been disgusted by the setting up of a dictatorship and had refused to fight for it. When the people of the entente countries learn how they have been tricked we must expect a strong revulsion of feeling, not in favor of the Bolsheviki, but in favor of stopping stupid interference of this sort and letting Russia settle for itself what its people want.

One of the unfortunate consequences of the French Government to continue to harass the Bolsheviki with minor military operations is that it gives excuse for a continuance of the censorship which has made possible the blundering policy of the allies. In our own country, now that the war has been won, we may look for a quick return to the publicity that Americans like. The only possible reason for secrecy would be that the allies were managing things badly and antagonizing the Russian people, and if this be true the fact should not be hidden, but set right. If the Bolsheviki are too strong to be overthrown, the question will arise how they are to be treated. Are they to be declared outlaws or recognized as representing Russia or put on the waiting list? These are questions depending on facts, and the democracies of France, Great Britain, and the United States are perfectly competent to decide when a foreign government has earned recognition. The public approved of the refusal to make a commercial treaty with the Czar while the passports of American Jews were dishonored; it can be trusted to judge Russia fairly if the facts are fully and impartially presented. We may confidently expect the administration soon to take measures to that end.

It was suggested last week that to get a coherent policy the allies would have to decide whether the menace of bolshevism was a matter of force or of ideas. Confusion upon this point has been growing since then, for the reason that as soon as the rumor got about that the allies had decided not to invade Russia the interventionists began to "play up" the dire peril of a Russian invasion. While they still hoped for intervention Trotzky's army was derided as fit only for Falstaff; as soon as the allies decided that it was indiscreet to attack the Bolsheviki the opposite tactics were adopted; the scarecrow Red Guard became overnight a superb army, millions strong, officered by German generals, and setting out unprovoked to conquer Germany and France by sheer force. One day Trotzky was packing up and a corporal's guard of allies, one might think, would do to take Moscow and save civilization; the next day the allies were invited to beat back countless Muscovite hordes, warlike, disciplined, well armed, well clothed, fanatically devoted to the propaganda of bolshevism.

For this mystery it is hard to find a parallel except in Russian finance. Financial history contains nothing more entertaining than the theory that the inexplicable strength of the Bolsheviki is due to German gold and that they are now using this ill-got wealth to bribe Germany in turn, a financial operation equaled only in the town where the people lived by taking in each other's washing. But the past week has seen a diverting addendum to this theory in the explanation that the strength of the Bolsheviki is due to their control of the printing press. With that remarkable engine, it seems, they can produce money in unlimited quantities, whereas Dictator Kolchak at Omsk is repining because many bales of paper money, neatly printed in America, are held up at Vladivostok pending developments. Apparently, then, the only hope of the anti-Bolsheviki is that the printing press at Moscow may break down from overstrain. For, while that operates, they are able to bribe all Russia and to maintain a huge army by paying in paper rubles, to be sure, fantastic wages to private soldiers, with surplus enough to bribe Germany, too.

No labored explanation of the hold of the Bolsheviki on Russia is needed, however, if we assume (1) that despite denials it has steadily been growing in strength, and (2) that the allies by a wrong policy have played into the hands of the Lenine government. Of the actual facts we as yet know little, but by inference from known conditions we may correct some of the wildest distortions of the truth. We may conclude off-hand that as an offensive force the Bolsheviki are not formidable. They have small arms enough, but no such equipment of artillery and other elaborate apparatus as would nowadays be required for such a crusading war as the French Revolution waged when goaded into it by attacks very much like those which the French are now making. Nor have the Russians, who got thoroughly weary of the war, shown an aggressive spirit. Whatever the danger of bolshevism may be, it is not at present the danger of a march to the Rhine.

It is to be assumed, too, that Russia is weak because it is a tightly blockaded country. It can produce food enough and can manufacture certain articles, but it is industrially backward and has long been cut off from foreign trade. It must therefore be progressively impoverished and the less capable of attacking the right and well-equipped nations of the west, even if the Russians should be seized with a warlike spirit, which at present they fortunately do not show.

The military peril, then, may be dismissed except as it affects Russia itself, including, of course, Siberia and the territories which the enemy seized and are now evacuating. Of these the chief is Ukraine, and there, as we have seen, the French are combating a separate revolution, which is at present anti-Bolshevist, though under attack by foreign armies supporting the dictator, Denikins, it might in self-defense join forces with the Lenine government.

Next in importance to Ukraine come the Baltic Provinces, from which the German armies are retreating, followed by a wave of bolshevism. This is not wholly Russian in character, however, because the Bolshevist movement in Russia has found no stronger supporters than the great number of revolutionists, specially Letts, who were driven out of these Provinces by the Government, and having no home or job in Russia, very naturally entered the Red Guard; to suppose them to be mere mercenaries, as has been alleged, is part of the bribery myth already referred to. They are, in fact, ardent revolutionists, and it is to be presumed that they make the main force of the armies which are recapturing their countries as the Germans retire.

The case of Lithuania is specially interesting, because the issue there is complicated by Polish imperialism. Poland in its grand days held Lithuania in a manner curiously like that in which the Austrian Empire held the old kingdom of Bohemia, and great Russia the Ukriane, a union for defense was perverted by successive encroachments into subjugation. Now that the Poles have won their own freedom, at which we are all delighted, they are seeking also to reclaim their lost empire, and their plea for invading Lithuania is the necessity of defending it against the Bolsheviki. It is a convenient plea, but the Russian doctrine of self-determination has got so strong a hold in eastern Europe that a Polish invasion of non-Polish territory is sure to make mischief. Moreover, we are beginning to hear that the Poles, too, are being "infected."

This infection of all the armies, not excluding the Czechs, which have fought the Bolsheviki, is a very curious phenomenon, yet not inexplicable. It can be understood if we assume (1) that the common people in all countries are averse to further slaughter for imperialistic ends, and (2) that the allied Governments by their intense secrecy as to what they are up to have left the people at the mercy of Bolshevist propaganda. For the Bolsheviki have a very definite propaganda. They assert that the Germans and the allies are two of a kind, that both have been fighting for conquests, for annexations, for indemnities. They have, moreover, certain documentary evidence in the shape of the treaties found in the Czar's archives. This sort of propaganda, taken with the predilection of the allied diplomats for supporting czarist and reactionary Russians, is very unsettling to the average soldier, so long as his own Government keeps him in the dark. It is the issue of imperialism, therefore, which at present makes bolshevism a menace. The menace would be greatly reduced by a just peace.

[From the Springfield Republican, Jan. 12, 1919.]

The feeling grows that the whole problem, in fact, of dealing with the revolution has been badly handled, and no great surprise was caused by the announcement Tuesday of the decision of the British Government against further military intervention in Russia. Assurance was given that there was no purpose of sending more troops, and that steps had been taken toward recalling part of the 20,000 men already in Russia. No statement of the reasons for this change of policy or as to the course to be followed in the future has yet been made. To some extent the decision may have resulted from the discussions held while Mr. Wilson was in London, for Russia was uppermost at that time, and it was understood that the general question of intervention was to be among the first topics to come up. But weight must also be given to the strong feeling in Great Britain against a protraction of the war; victory has been won and the people want peace. In particular the men who were conscripted to fight Germany are clamoring for demobilization. They do not want to police the continent indefinitely, and still less do they want to be ordered abroad for a war against Russia, which is what intervention means at the present time. We need not overstress reports that fear of the spread of bolshevism in England led to the decision, but unquestionably it is now realized that intervention as the allies have actually applied it has been a potent means of fanning the flames of revolution—fanning them, be it noted, toward the west.

What might, perhaps, have been accomplished by really adequate intervention there has been no occasion to discuss in these reviews, because at no time have the allies had resources and facilities for adequate intervention. While the war lasted they were restricted to roundabout routes of access, and when victory opened the Black Sea and the Baltic revolution had spread so widely as to make what might happen at Moscow or Petrograd an affair of minor moment. At present, with the temper of Europe what it is, even a strong international campaign against the Russian soviets might involve more risk than a statesman would care to run. Even France, where feeling is most bitter against the new régime in Russia, there is no willingness to send an army to Moscow, though the French Government persists in its fatuous course of fighting the revolution in Ukraine.

To say that intervention has failed is not to say that the Bolsheviki have won. Their government may collapse any day; and though unverified, the report is not incredible that Lenine has been arrested by Trotsky on the charge of readiness to compromise. Of the two Trotsky appears to be the more violent and the more vindictive; there seems to be some ground for the assertion from Russian sources that the savage reprisals for the attempt on Lenine's life would not have been made if he had not been laid up with his wound. Lenine is extreme enough in his theories, but seems less energetic in action than Trotsky, upon whom has devolved a great part of the executive side of the revolution, including the organization of the new army. Control of that would give him an obvious advantage over his colleague if there has been, as rumored, a clash between them. In any case the fall of the Lenine government is more likely if the allies leave it alone than if by invading Russia they rally millions of ignorant people to support against a foreign foe.

When a bad military policy has decisively failed it is well to go back and examine freshly the reasons assigned for undertaking it. For the Russian campaigns no better statement can be found than in an article by the Russian, Paul Vinogradoff, resident in London, which was published last June, and which not improbably had a decisive and unfortunate effect upon entente policy. He argued:

"The first requirement is to create a basis for operations by establishing points d'appui for military stores and opening up lines of contact with the Russian people. Convenient centers are indicated by geography and are partly equipped even now. I mean, primarily, the Murman line and Archangel; in a lesser degree Vladivostok and the Manchurian railway; in the future possibly the Persian front. As the Germans are taking advantage of their proximity to Russia by foraging freely in the cornfields of the south, Great Britain and her allies should take advantage of the command of the sea to establish military centers in the Murman and in Archangel; nor could there be any suspicion of selfish encroachment if the Japanese acted in conjunction with the Americans and British on the Siberian front * * * it would certainly be a grievous mistake on the part of the allies if they did not use the short summer season to create a strong base in northern Russia * * *. If Great Britain and France are able to spare men and material for Salonica, surely they ought to be able to send a few thousand volunteers to secure and develop their line in contact with Russia."

Two months later the allies seized Archangel by force, and the test of these theories began. It can now clearly be seen, and was suspected by close students of the war at the time, that the theories on which intervention was based were unsound in every particular.

To get at Germany the allies had to get through Russia. To get through Russia they had either to work through the de facto government or set up another; they refused to work through the de facto government, even had that been possible, therefore they could not get at the Germans until they had set up a new government in Russia. But this meant a new Russian revolution, simply as a preliminary to a new campaign against Germany, and while one may disturb an enemy by starting a revolt in his country, it is not so easy to get help from an ally by starting a civil war as a preliminary. But this was precisely what the allies undertook to do in Russia. Whether it was a legitimate thing to do or not is beside the point; it failed, because it was based on false assumptions. Not even the censorship could long hide the fact that conditions in Russia were not in the least as they were depicted in the international press, and that instead of raising Russian armies to fight Germany, the allies were rapidly drifting into war with the Russian people. That insane adventure is well abandoned; peace just now is the greatest need.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in hot resentment recently replied to the strictures of the Senator from Iowa upon the corporation termed the "War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau." I listened with interest to his remarks then. The organization was incorporated November 6, 1918, for the purpose of accomplishing, as the Senator from Nebraska said:

The economic penetration of Russia for the purpose of bringing relief to a country that was fairly weltering in distress and misery, many of whose social and political crimes were growing out of that misery.

Five million dollars was put aside for the purpose described by the Senator from Nebraska as—

Friendly penetration, by the sending of American products into Russia and the bringing of Russian products out of Russia in exchange for them, to promote trade and create a prosperity that could not come about from natural causes.

All efforts ceased with the signing of the armistice, because, as the Senator from Nebraska said:

We have come to the end of the war substantially.

What a marvelous situation! We prepared in the early days of November last to supply Russia with what she needed and to take from her what she could sell—a friendly economic penetration—and to aid the Russian people. How could it be done except in conjunction with the very people who were in control of Russia? We see, therefore, an elaborate scheme initiated by our Government, without consultation at all, apparently, for economic cooperation with Russia; and yet, when the offers in writing for economic cooperation were made again, and again, during 1918, by the very people with whom we would have to deal in November, our Government, apparently, would not respond or reply or have aught to do with the offers, because of the wickedness of their authors; and then, after repulsing these offers with contemptuous silence, prepares itself with $5,000,000 to do the very same thing. It ceased its efforts with the armistice. Just think of it! On the 6th day of November, 1918, in the language of the Senator from Nebraska, we had started on the enterprise with Russia of "bringing them shoes and food and clothes and the things they were without." Five days later we ceased our efforts and brought the Russians instead starvation and bullets and bayonets. Our efforts at charity and benevolence ended, because, as the Senator said:

We have come to the end of the war substantially, and I presume, for the same reason, because we had come to the end of the war substantially, and would not deal in friendliness and charity, we began to invade and to shoot and to starve and to kill. We "had come to the end of the war substantially," and we could not, therefore, economically penetrate Russia, but we could shoot Russians after we "had come to the end of the war substantially."

Mr. President, no one has less sympathy than I with the Bolsheviki of Russia, who there ruthlessly control with a hideous class tyranny. None will more scornfully reject their grotesque doctrine. But I will not permit my feelings for the men or their formulæ to blind me to our own wrongdoing, nor will I cloak our wrong with hypocritical denunciation. During the war it became fashionable to call all who disagreed with any governmental policy pro-German. Now the fashion has changed; and any man who will not accept the wrongful edict of intrenched power is by that token a Bolsheviki. In making the world safe for democracy we have put our intellects in chains; and one of our first tasks with ourselves is to unlock the prisons in which we have confined our brains. I read of great statesmen of ours saying "Shoot them down" and others "Hang them." You can not shoot or hang a state of mind. When it becomes by open expression treasonable, under the law of the land you may punish it. But if men in high places imagine by invoking lawlessness against lawlessness they can make the world better, all history denies them. I think too well of my country to believe for one instant the doctrine of Bolsheviki Russia can ever find a foothold here. My faith in the Republic and in our people, in our democracy, will not permit me to be frightened by the fantasy of madmen elsewhere. I think I can with equanimity observe the servile part of the press apply to me for this speech the now familiar epithet of Bolsheviki. Its indiscriminate application is illustrated by a New York administration paper designating prohibitionists as the Bolsheviki of America. My appeal to-day will find no response with those newspapers and great men who preach anarchy when they demand killing and hanging out of hand; but it will have its answering approval with the inarticulate mass who ask but justice and the same honesty in governments as in men, it will find its echo in the hearts of the common folks whose sons and husbands in frozen Russia are paying the price of our Government's wrong and broken faith, and I am content.

Why did we enter Russia? I answer, for no very good reason; and we have remained for no reason at all.

What is our policy toward Russia? I answer we have no policy. We have engaged in a miserable misadventure, stultifying our professions, and setting at naught our promises. We have punished no guilty; we have but brought misery and starvation and death to the innocent. We have garnered none of the fruits of the victory of war, but suffer the odium and infamy of undeclared warfare. We have sacrificed our own blood to no purpose, and into American homes have brought sorrow and anguish and suffering.

Bring the American boys home from Russia.

Mr. POLLOCK and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. POLLOCK. I merely desire to make an announcement, if the Senator will indulge me.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

Mr. POLLOCK. Mr. President, when I announced on yesterday that I would address the Senate immediately after the morning business to-day I was not aware of the fact that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] had already given a similar notice. In view of the lateness of the hour and the desire of the committee having charge of the bill which is now before the Senate to press the consideration of that measure as rapidly as possible, out of consideration for the committee, I shall postpone the remarks I had intended to submit at this time, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short time to-morrow immediately after the morning business.

FRANCE AND THE BOLSHEVIKI.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate in speaking upon the subject of our duty toward or in Russia. I may at a later date ask the indulgence of the Senate for that purpose; but I find in the last number of the Outlook cable correspondence from Paris by Ernest Hamlin Abbott, giving the attitude of France toward the Bolsheviki. It is an official statement, and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FRANCE AND THE BOLSHEVIKI: AN OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

[Cable correspondence from Paris by Ernest Hamlin Abbott.]

The officially authorized statement following, expressly prepared for The Outlook, gives the position of the French Government concerning the situation of Russia in the peace conference:

"The French Government is of the opinion that Bolshevism is a permanent danger to peace and civilization, and that the government of the Soviets is actually at war with the allies. It is therefore impossible to renew diplomatic relations with that government, even taking it as a government de facto. The French Government feels justified in its attitude, because in fighting against Bolshevism France is not in the least interfering with the home politics of a foreign country but merely endeavoring to eradicate a system which is based on nothing but disorder and crime.

"Bolshevism can not be reasonably called a system of government, but the tyranny of a very small clique over the bulk of the nation. Fighting Bolshevism means, first and foremost, protecting Russia against a régime which all those who have escaped from Russia are unanimous in condemning. It also means protecting civilization in Europe, as the activity of Bolshevist propagandists is a menace, not only to the immediate neighbors of Russia but also to the allied and neutral countries, one of the conditions of the very existence of Bolshevism being its expansion abroad.

"For the allies to remain passive, therefore, would mean to lose ground and leave whole countries, especially those in which over four years' disturbed political and economic conditions may have created a certain nervousness, the prey of a propaganda which has nothing in view but disorder and, as far as can be ascertained, is unable to find a basis of normal government.

"Bolshevism has already endeavored to promote anarchy in neutral countries, such as Sweden, Spain, and Switzerland, and in Berlin. Bolshevist money and literature are not spared to create in foreign countries a favorable atmosphere, while arms are ready to be sent into countries shaken by the propaganda. Bolshevist troops are already invading the countries which all the allies are desirous of bringing into existence, such as Poland, and thus to prevent the organization of nations that have long been kept under the yoke of Germany, which is determined to accept the help of Bolshevism to prevent their emancipation. The true statesman is he who has not only in view the immediate future, but especially he who foresees the further development. It would be a short-sighted policy to abandon Russia and to prolong anarchy. This would only tend to absolute disorganization of the country and to leave her an open field of German expansion and colonization. Crushing Bolshevism does not mean for the French Government a return to Czarism and reaction. In fact, the French Government has refused to accept the help of the reactionaries in Russia and has even required guarantees from the influential organizations which France has helped that they are only collaborating in a common program of fighting Bolshevism as the enemy of democracy.

"And the French Government has done this because it realizes that the restoration of anything like the old régime in Russia would be a calamity. There is a whole world between Czarism and Bolshevism, and what France wants is what all the allies want, a true democracy compatible with the new order that has come out of the war, and which President Wilson has helped so much to create. France has always been ready to fight for the liberty of others; in fact, her great revolution opened the door to democracy in Europe. Bolshevism is not democracy, but a régime of terror and tyranny.

"France welcomed, and still welcomes, the revolution in Russia, and to such an extent that she has always refused to support the reactionary element, which, although desirous of restoring order in Russia, has not given sufficient guarantee for free development of democratic ideas and institutions in that country. Accusations that France lent money to Russia while she had a despotic government and now wants dividends from Russia while she is still suffering from reaction against the old despotism apply equally to all nations that have lent money to Russia or other despotically ruled countries, such as Turkey. But it must be remembered that France's object in lending money to Russia was to reinforce the economic, moral, and military strength of her ally against the German menace to the world. While it is in the interest of the world's stability that governments should observe their obligations, France's interest in the restoration of order in Russia under a democratic government is altogether apart from any financial considerations.

"It is the interest of preserving in Russia and her neighbors, including all the allies, liberty as against anarchy. France on this point, as on others, is at one with her allies, with whom she will always collaborate in order to promote sound democracy in Russia against Bolshevism.

"The only divergences that may exist are merely on questions of ways and means, but not principles."

PARIS, FRANCE, January 16, 1919.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Like the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. POLLOCK], I had given notice of an intention to address the Senate on the subject of the reorganization of the Army, taking advantage of the first opportunity. I had expected to proceed to-day, but the hour has grown so late that I am unwilling to take further time from the consideration of the very important measure which is now before the Senate. Following the Senator from South Carolina to-morrow, if there be sufficient time remaining during the morning hour, I shall speak for a few minutes; if not, then on the first day following, at the close of the morning hour.

CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS ON FOREIGN ACCOUNT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It will only take me a moment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, then; but I am very anxious to get this bill up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It will take me just a moment.

A few days ago I submitted to the Senate some remarks in reference to the policy of refusing our shipyards the right to enter into contracts for the construction of ships on foreign account. I had given a copy of the report of the Shipping Board, made pursuant to a Senate resolution, which set out the applications that had been made and the action taken upon them, to Mr. H. P. Wilson, of the Foundation Co., the company to which I referred as having built some yards in this country for the French Government. I have a letter from Mr. Wilson with reference to this matter, and also some copies of letters written by him and received by him to and from the Shipping Board bearing up this subject. There are some very interesting facts set out in these communications, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, January 23, 1919.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JONES: I have analyzed the memorandum you gave me last Saturday, which was a reply from the United States Shipping Board to Senate resolution 334, "Construction of ships in American yards for foreign account."

The statement of the Shipping Board verifies my representations to you that the construction of steel ships in American yards for foreign account is one squarely up to the President, and that the present and future policy appears to be solely and entirely in his individual hands.

The list of applicants for permits, as set forth in the memorandum, does not appear to include certain applications of the Foundation Co., as per correspondence hereunto attached.

In talking with you the other day, I was under the impression that no official application had been made by our company for the conversion of our Portland and Tacoma yards from wood to steel, and for the construction therein of a large number of steel ships for French account. I find, however, that on December 4, as per copy inclosed, we filed with the acting chairman of the Shipping Board an application in writing, and that on December 7, as per copy likewise inclosed, we received official reply rejecting our application.

We also find that our application of last July for the construction of wooden ships at these yards is not listed in this memorandum. To what extent the list may be in error beyond the instances cited is a matter for conjecture. These specific applications of our own cover larger contract items than any of those appearing on the list, hence the omission thereof makes a very radical change in the showing as presented to the Senate.

Our yards at Portland, Oreg., and Tacoma, Wash., were started in July, 1917, and while at that time no official permission from the Shipping Board for the construction of yards was necessary, the said board was made fully cognizant of our plan, and verbally approved our construction program.

We also filed with the Shipping Board full correspondence in connection not only with the yards but with our French contracts which we proposed to execute therein. These contracts called for 20 wooden ships to be built in each of the two yards, with an option to the French Government to build 40 more in each yard, and with the consent and full approval of the Shipping Board the French Government invested their money in the construction of these two yards.

During 1918 these two yards turned out as many wooden boats as all of the other wooden shipyards on the Pacific coast. I am attaching hereto a newspaper clipping showing the number of boats actually delivered from the Seattle district, and indicating that the Tacoma yard alone turned out 20 of the 50 boats delivered, both wood and steel. I mention this latter feature more particularly to show you that these yards were operated under the highest efficiency during the period that tonnage was most seriously needed.

In due course the Shipping Board was notified that the French Government had elected to exercise its option to build more ships at these yards. Notwithstanding the fact that the yards had been constructed with French capital under the full approval of the Shipping Board, and with full understanding of the contract with us under which the said yards were constructed, and notwithstanding the fact that at the time the said notification was made the Shipping Board had adopted a policy of constructing as few wooden vessels as possible, the application for the building of further ships under said option was denied.

This meant the laying off of approximately 8,000 men, and the closing up of these two yards, and it was this refusal on the part of the Shipping Board that necessitated our going to Victoria, British Columbia, for the construction of additional boats under our said French contract.

After the armistice was signed and the construction of these boats had been started at Victoria the Shipping Board issued a general permit for the construction of wooden ships for foreign account. In so far as this particular contract was concerned, the relief came too late, and the net result is that our being compelled to go to Victoria required a large additional investment in construction of plant and threw out of work in our yards at Portland and Tacoma not less than 4,000 men who would otherwise have been employed for a period of 18 months, and the closing down of two of the most efficient shipyards in the United States.

The general permit to build wooden boats for foreign account came too late to be of material benefit to American shipyards. You are, of course, aware of the fact that wooden seagoing vessels are purely an emergency proposition, and that had ample steel been available for steel construction the probabilities are that construction of this character would have been reduced to the minimum, if such construction had occurred at all. At the time, however, that the permit for the construction of wooden vessels was issued, when permits covering steel construction were withheld, there was available in this country all classes of materials, including steel and labor, for the carrying out of a comprehensive steel construction program for foreign account. As an example, we were given, almost immediately following the signing of the armistice, a permit from the War Industries Board to purchase 100,000 tons of steel, plates and angles, for ship construction. Having this amount of steel immediately available we made application to the Shipping Board, as above, for the conversion of the Portland and Tacoma yards for the purpose not only of constructing such steel ships as the French Government were willing to purchase from us, but to prevent the original investment in these yards from becoming a loss to the French Government. Nothwithstanding, however, this availability of labor and materials, and the moral obligation on the part of the United States Government, after permitting the French Government to invest its money in these two yards, to allow them to make adequate use thereof to the extent, at least, of justifying the said investment, the application for the conversion of these yards was denied.

Other Governments had signified their willingness to contract with us for the construction of additional steel ships, but owing to the policy adopted by the Shipping Board, although evidently under the instructions of the President of the United States, these foreign Governments have been compelled to establish yards in their own countries, and our company is now engaged in negotiating contracts for the establishment of no less than four foreign yards and the operation thereof in the construction of steel merchantmen.

During this time, when labor's demands are so insistent for employment and we are threatened with an army of unemployed skilled labor, it seems almost incomprehensible that the shipbuilding industry in this country should be forced into foreign fields, more particularly so when ample materials for all requirements are immediately available here.

Due to this policy contracts are now being placed in foreign countries, and as soon as the present acute demand for steel ships is over this country will be unable to obtain prices commensurate with anything approximating costs of labor and material as at present existing throughout this country, and it will mean that American shipyards will be totally unable to take orders for long deliveries in competition with foreign yards.

At the present time foreign governments are willing to pay for quick delivery prices within the possibility of American shipbuilders, but the attitude of the Shipping Board compels the latter to hold their hands in idleness and to see this vast business go elsewhere.

You may be interested in knowing that the Foundation Co. has constructed and put into actual service about 65 per cent as many wooden ships during the period of the war and up to December 1, 1918, in four shipyards, as the Emergency Fleet Corporation has produced and put into actual service during the same period from 81 yards. The Portland and Tacoma yards alone have turned out 40 during the last year, which is approximately the same number as the Emergency Fleet Corporation has built in all of the wooden yards on the Pacific coast.

Only prompt action on the part of the Shipping Board will save the shipbuilding industry in this country, in so far as it applies to foreign account, from utter disaster. Relief at the end of a further waste of material time will be without benefit to the American shipbuilder, as was the case in the matter of wooden construction.

The actual condition existing to-day in the steel-ship building industry is that many yards are idle, due to cancellation of contracts made with the Shipping Board. While American builders are permitted under present rulings of the Shipping Board to take contracts for private owners under United States registry, private owners are dubious about placing contracts in advance of some definite policy being established by the Shipping Board. This, of course, leaves many yards and thousands of men idle. From our viewpoint it is difficult to explain why the Shipping Board, proceeding under a limited construction program, should continue to spend public moneys in the construction of merchant ships without a fixed shipping policy, and why, after the emergency which created it has ceased to exist, it should be permitted to exercise arbitrary control over privately owned yards, forcing them into idleness, in the face of ample business being offered to them.

The subject is a big one, and I could write on indefinitely regarding it, but I think you are sufficiently familiar with it to make unnecessary further comment on my part.

In conclusion, therefore, permit me to say that the memorandum from the Shipping Board is, to say the least, vague and indefinite, to say nothing of its inaccuracies in the figures furnished.

Permit me to subscribe myself,

Respectfully, yours,

H. P. WILSON.

LAUNCH 50 SHIPS—TACOMA SHIPBUILDING RECORD FOR 1918 COMPRISES VESSELS VALUED AT $27,900,000.

TACOMA, January 7.

Tacoma closed 1918 with its greatest shipbuilding record.

The total cost of vessels constructed can be approximately placed at $27,900,000, with the tonnage at 185,000, and the number of vessels launched for the year at 50. This included 8 steel vessels, 20 auxiliary schooners, and 22 Ferris type ships. In 1917 there was an average of 4,540 men employed in the Tacoma shipyards; in 1918, 14,896.

JOHN A. DONALD, Esq.,
Acting Chairman United States Shipping Board,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Foundation Co. I respectfully ask permission of the Shipping Board to build steel ships in the yards of the French Government located at Portland, Oreg., and Tacoma, Wash.

I am sailing for France to-morrow and would like to be in a position on my arrival at Paris to negotiate with the French Government for the construction of a large program of steel ships in the United States.

I expect to meet strong English competition, but I feel confident that on account of greater speed in building we can bring this business to this country if we are given a permit to build the vessels here.

I respectfully urge that the matter be given immediate consideration by your board.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) FRANKLIN REMINGTON,
President.

FRANKLIN REMINGTON,
President the Foundation Co.,
Woolworth Building, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of December 4 requesting the permission of the Shipping Board to construct steel ships in the yards of the French Government located at Portland, Oreg., and Tacoma, Wash.

In reply, you are advised that at a meeting of the Shipping Board held yesterday a resolution was passed permitting the construction of steel ships in our yards for the account of private owners or corporations having their domicile in the United States, and therefore with United States registry when completed.

For certain reasons, which it is not possible for me to define at present, the construction of steel tonnage to be owned by foreign interests has for the time being been held up.

I am not in position to say when the restrictions on building for foreign registry will be rescinded, but should any change take place in the policy of the board you will be duly advised. Meantime the policy of permitting foreigners to construct wooden ships in this country is unrestricted.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) JOHN A. DONALD,
Acting Chairman.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION,
Washington, D. C.

(Attention of Mr. Carey, director of operations.)

GENTLEMEN: Complying with your request, I inclose herewith outline plans of the ships which we are building for the British and French Governments, and also information covering tonnage, cost, etc.

Should the Shipping Board desire it, we can build either type of vessel in large quantities. We are at present building 40 ships of the French type and expect to turn these out at the rate of one every four days, beginning next month. We have already launched one of the British type of vessels.

French ships: This ship is an auxiliary schooner 3,000 tons deadweight. She is equipped with twin screws, 700 horsepower engines, and will steam at the rate of 7 to 9 knots. Under steam and sail the speed will run as high as 12 knots, depending on the velocity of the wind. This ship carries only lower sail; has big hatches, and needs a crew of only 12 to 15 men to operate it. It is especially well adapted for the coastwise trade, the South American trade, the Australian trade, and for carrying bulk cargoes, such as coal, nitrates, etc. It is a practical ship, good for "after-the-war" conditions. It is a small coal consumer, which, at this time, is an important factor. The ship can be operated to advantage where the submarine danger does not exist and can be used to replace ships which are more desirable for the trans-Atlantic service. The ship can be built for $475,000, and we can build 30 of these vessels at the above price and deliver the full number of 30 boats within 21 months' time.

British ships: This ship is a straight steamer, 250 feet long, with a dead-weight capacity of 2,800 tons; speed 9½ to 10 knots, equipped with 1,000 horsepower engines. This vessel is designed by one of the best British architects, and is a very fine ship in every way. She is classified A-1 under Lloyd's. She has a heavy steel keelson running the length of the vessel. This ship is an all-around practical boat, and can be used to advantage in any part of the world not frequented by submarines. We can build a large number of these vessels if the Shipping Board desires them, at a cost of $550,000 each.

Lumber and labor conditions on the Pacific coast: I inclose herewith a letter written by the West Coast Lumber Emergency Bureau regarding the lumber conditions on the coast to-day. From this letter you will note that the cut of fir this year will be approximately 4,000,000,000 feet, of which about 15 per cent, or 600,000,000 feet, will be suitable for shipbuilding. The vessels I have described above each take about 125,000,000 feet of lumber. It will be seen therefore that the lumber output for this year should be sufficient to build about 500 ships. I call your attention also to the last paragraph in his letter, in which he states: "I believe we can furnish all the firm timber for all the wooden ships that our shipyards on the Pacific coast can produce and still have a large amount of big sizes left suitable for the shipbuilding on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts." This information checks up with our own investigation. The representative of the Shipping Board at Portland—Mr. Wentworth—if requested to do so, will certify that there is room at Portland, so far as lumber and labor is concerned, for 10 additional ways, and that 30 ships can be built on these 10 ways without affecting existing construction.

We feel, therefore, that, by adding 10 ways to the amount of shipbuilding we are now doing in Portland, we can turn out 30 vessels for the Shipping Board, of either the French or British type, more rapidly than any other shipbuilders in the country can do, and we are positive that we can get the lumber and men for this work without upsetting in any way existing conditions.

Trusting that this gives you the information which you desire, we are

Very truly, yours,

Mr. M. D. FERRIS,
Manager Contract Division, Emergency Fleet Corporation, 120 North Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation of yesterday regarding construction of wooden ships for the Emergency Fleet Corporation in yards operated by us for the French Government at Portland and Tacoma, beg to advise we have a complete 10-way yard at both Portland and Tacoma for turning out a complete ship, and we are now closing a contract with the French Government and completing the deliveries of 40 complete ships for them. We have idle ways at both yards at the present time

We have received word from the French commission that they desired to place additional boats in these yards, but they advise us they have received word from the Shipping Board that they will not be permitted to complete any further boats in this country, and they ask us what arrangements can be made for the disposal of the yards.

We propose to build for the Emergency Fleet Corporation 10 boats in each yard, making arrangements with the French Government for a yard rental or a depreciation charge for the use of the yard for this construction, and we would like to close contracts with the Fleet Corporation on a basis proportionate to that arranged for for barges in our Newark yard, as they will be operated under similar conditions and would occupy the yard at the same time with the French boats we are already constructing on a similar basis.

We would be pleased to discuss this matter with you in detail at an early date.

We have understood in conversation with Mr. Schwab that he desired what additional wooden boats the Fleet Corporation would build, to be built in the Northwest, and we believe we have two of the most complete and efficient yards in this territory, employing in the neighborhood of between 5,000 and 6,000 men.

Yours, very truly, THE FOUNDATION CO.

GENTLEMEN: Receipt is acknowledged of your telegrams of August 28, relative to your proposal of August 21 to construct for the Shipping Board 10 vessels each in your Portland, Oreg., and Tacoma, Wash., yards upon ways erected and operated for the French Government.

In reply you are advised that our present program includes only a sufficient number of vessels of the type that you desire to construct to keep the ways busy in those yards which are now building for the corporation.

It is regretted, therefore, that we can not at this time consider the construction of vessels at the plants above named.

THE FOUNDATION CO.,

Mr. CHARLES M. SCHWAB,
Director General United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: We wish to call your attention to the 10-way shipyards at Portland and Tacoma owned by the French Government and operated by us. The French Government closed a contract with us for forty (40) wooden vessels in these yards, with an option of two lots of 40 more, and at the time of the expiration of their option with us they expressed a desire to exercise this option and build additional wooden vessels, but they were advised by Mr. Hurley that no more wooden vessels could be built in this country for France. Naturally our thought and the thought of the French Government was that the output of these yards was to be utilized by the United States Government, and with their consent we proposed to the Fleet Corporation to build boats in these yards for the United States Government.

We were informally advised by Mr. Ferris yesterday that it was not the policy of the United States Government to build any wooden vessels in these yards, but suggested to us that we secure contracts to build for private account.

If the policy of the Emergency Fleet Corporation now is to cut down on further wooden-ship construction, and the Fleet Corporation for this reason has no use for our Portland and Tacoma yards, can we not in this case be given permission to build ships for the French Government and in this way keep these two organizations going?

We understand from the French Government officials that they are in most urgent need of ships. We have established for them on the Pacific coast these two yards, which are among the most efficient wooden yards in this country.

We have launched to date 25 vessels and have delivered 17 finished ships to them. We have eight vacant ways at the present time, and are launching and delivering two vessels about every 10 days.

We have built up an efficient organization of some 6,000 men, experienced in the construction of wooden vessels, and the people at Portland and Tacoma have all given us their earnest support in the matter of accommodations, with the understanding and desire that this venture be made as permanent as possible, and the question of closing down of these yards, in the face of the fact that our allies are in such urgent need of additional tonnage, seems worthy of your earnest consideration.

We would respectfully ask, therefore, that we be permitted to build 20 wooden steamers of about 3,000 tons dead-weight capacity in each of these two yards for the Government of the Republic of France, and would be pleased to know what your views are on this matter.

Very truly, yours,

———, President.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, at the time the Senate took a recess last evening there was pending before the Senate a proposed amendment to this bill offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] had proposed an amendment to it, which was accepted by the Senator from Nevada. I am willing to accept, so far as I am able to do so, the proposed amendment and let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, before that amendment is adopted I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

On page 2 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, as printed, on line 7, I move to strike out all of the remaining portion of the paragraph, beginning with the word "the"—that is, I move to strike out the words "the production of which was requested or demanded by the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, the Department of the Interior, or other agency of the Government"—and insert in lieu thereof the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada it is proposed to strike out the words "the production of which was requested or demanded by the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, the Department of the Interior, or other agency of the Government," and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

the production of which by any claimant or claimants was requested or demanded by personal solicitation of or personal inducement to such claimant or claimants made by the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, or the Department of the Interior.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I realize the urgent necessity for early action on this bill by the Senate. I agree with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] that the Senate should take quick action and get this bill passed and to conference. Therefore I am not going to delay the passage of the bill so that it may go to conference, and I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware in order that we may get to conference with it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in a matter of this importance, involving, as this amendment does, several millions of dollars, it does not seem to me that it should go through the Senate merely upon acceptance on the part of the Senator who offers the amendment. I should like to have the Senator who offers this amendment explain what his amendment accomplishes and how it changes the pending amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I had not expected to make any remarks on the amendment offered after I learned that the Senator from Nevada was willing to accept the amendment. My opinion was that the amendment as introduced by the Senator from Nevada was entirely too broad in its scope. The thought occurred to me that under the language of the amendment as submitted by the Senator from Nevada certain cases could be compensated for which have no standing in law or equity entitling them to any compensation.

I will illustrate my thought by putting a case. Let us suppose that somebody embarked upon a plan of business expansion and laid out money, not as a result of any inducement offered by any Government department or any Government agent but simply in response to some sort of general propaganda that was carried on by the Government in the form of publicity, advertisements urging people to produce and work and get busy to help win the war; and let us suppose that a person induced by that very indefinite solicitation embarked upon that program, as I say, of business expansion and lost by the operation. It occurs to me that that individual ought to receive no remedy under this bill. Therefore it seemed to me that the amendment as drawn was entirely too broad, and the amendment which I have offered to the amendment is designed to limit the remedies which might be availed of under the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

I will say to the Senator that my purpose was not by any means to extend this remedy, but rather to restrict it, and I think the language that I have drawn to an extent undoubtedly does restrict it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall not make any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada; but I simply want to point out to the Senate that attaching to a bill an amendment of this character, which is not germane to the subject of the bill, is a practice which should be stopped. Matters of this character delay the progress of a bill, because they involve additional controversy in the conference committees.

Here is a bill which affects the business interests of the country to a far greater extent, I think, than the Senate realizes. For two months we have been considering this measure in committee. It is nearly three months since the armistice was signed. At that time the business interests of the country and the manufacturing interests of the country had to face a reduction in production and had to face the cancellation of orders, and for that period of time they have been awaiting the adjustment of the Government contracts. Now, the business man or manufacturer desirous of converting his factory or his house to the civilian trade can not do so while the payments for the large contracts he has made with the Government are in abeyance.

It is necessary, therefore, that this bill should be passed, in order that relief may be granted these business men and manufacturers in the country. Two billion dollars are involved in the bill. There are several billion more involved in contracts that are lawful contracts awaiting settlement. Let us assume it is $7,000,000,000 that must very soon be released to the manufacturers and business men in this country or else we will have an industrial panic, and it is imminent. I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who is not directly interested in the bill who has not some manufacturer or business man in his State or community who is striving now to get a settlement with the Government for the goods he has sold to it or manufactured for it.

The Assistant Secretary of War told me this morning that the passage of this bill is imperative, because the failure to pass it will increase the idleness that now exists in the country. He said these manufacturers can not continue the employment of labor unless these contracts are settled.

I was also informed this morning that there is such a surplus of labor that 800,000 soldiers who have been discharged by the Army are roaming the streets seeking employment and can not find it. They have been in many of the cities assembled by the Bolsheviki, and through that sympathy they have been induced to form soldiers' societies to protest against the treatment of the Government in bringing them back here and discharging them and not providing employment for them. You can readily see that the most beneficent thing we can do for these men is to release these funds to the manufacturers of the country so that they may continue the employment of men who have been thrown out of employment by reason of the suspension of the activities of these manufacturing concerns. The situation is imminent. There is trouble ahead, and we will have been fiddling here while Rome was burning. I think there ought not to be one moment's delay in passing the bill. I feel that we should not put an amendment on the bill which is entirely foreign to the subject matter which is contained in it as a contract bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to reply. The men who come within this amendment and will be granted relief are just as loyal and as patriotic and need the assistance just as badly as the contractors referred to by the Senator from New Jersey. I would not think of introducing this amendment and asking for its passage if I thought it would seriously interfere with the passage of the bill now before the Senate. But I do not believe it will. I am not going to take the time of the Senate, because I realize the urgency of quick action on the measure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In this connection I am going to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill whether he believes this amendment would delay the action of the conferees on the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so, Mr. President. If it does, of course if the Senator desires to make a point of order, that course is open to him. I want to agree with the Senator from Nevada in his statement that the men who are affected, while not numerous, will be just as seriously affected as the larger contractors of the Government. As a matter of fact a number of the governmental institutions which are mentioned in the amendment have asked men in the West to contract for manganese ore, for instance, and for chrome ore, and they have gone to a good deal of expense in undertaking to do so. They complied with all the demands the Government made upon them. I do not think it will interfere with the proceedings under the bill itself.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With that statement, I am perfectly willing to have the amendment agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask unanimous consent to correct what is plainly an error, as I think the RECORD will show. There ought to be a comma after the word "profit," on line 9, page 11. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was the author of that amendment, and I believe he agrees to the correction. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that that amendment, page 11, line 9, be corrected, so that there will be a comma after the word "profit." I am using the reprint of the bill. Then I ask that the words "so canceled," the last words in line 12, on page 11, which are unnecessary and somewhat ambiguous and confusing, be eliminated, so that the sentence would end with the word "order," in line 12.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can the Senator refer to the original bill and not to the reprint?

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not appear in the original bill. It is an amendment. I am referring to the reprint which was laid on our tables this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires if the Senator refers to the last two words in section 2?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. The words "so canceled" should be eliminated, and a comma should be inserted after the word "profit," in line 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so amended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to this same proviso, the reprint does not show a proviso I offered that was accepted by the Senator from Tennessee, reading as follows:

Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not apply to any contract executed in compliance with all statutory requirements.

I looked at the RECORD, and I think the Senate did adopt it, but I will reoffer the amendment to clear it up inasmuch as it does appear. It was accepted by the committee yesterday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask if the Senator is offering that to the reprint or to the original?

Mr. LENROOT. To the reprint, on page 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the reprint of the bill, after line 12, insert:

Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not apply to any contract executed in compliance with all statutory requirements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to what seems to me requires a verbal amendment on page 9 of the reprint, line 9. The word "to" should be inserted after the word "as" so as to read "as to the interpretation."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that suggestion is proper, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that change will be made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee about the situation as developed in our State to see whether or not the bill covers it. I ask the chairman whether the bill would cover contracts made with the United States Spruce Production Corporation for the production of spruce in connection with airplanes?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If there was an agency of the War Department——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand there was.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the bill is broad enough to cover it. The Senator is referring to a telegram he received from the West this morning?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I did not receive any telegram this morning, but I received a letter the other day setting out that certain firms in our State were directed to get out spruce for the Army. I will read an extract from the letter of one of the attorneys who has been representing those people. He names the parties, and he says:

Each of these parties cut spruce logs to short noncommercial lengths upon written orders from Gen. Disque. The logs were ordered stored and not sold on the general market. In some instances the logs were removed by the Government. Shortly before the armistice was declared a general order was made releasing all such logs, so that the owner could sell in the general market. Owing, however, to the logs being of short length and the general market having been closed by Government orders for so long, the logs were not and are not merchantable except at a great loss.

Then he says further:

A large amount of spruce logs was cut to Government order in logging camps under the actual direction of the Government at wages fixed by the Government. When under these circumstances the owner is forbidden to sell in the general market, and the market is thus destroyed, I consider that there is a legal obligation, as well as a moral obligation, upon the Government to take the logs so cut.

Further he says:

The War Department has appointed a contract board, to whom claims based on contracts are to be presented. But this board takes a position that it has no authority to allow any claim where there is no written contract.

This letter was referred to the War Department by Representative JOHNSON of our State, and he received a reply from the War Department under date of January 28, 1919, signed by Paul D. Elgin, second lieutenant, A. S., A. P., in which he says:

In this connection please be advised that all spruce operations were under the auspices of the United States Spruce Production Corporation, which was formed for the purpose of getting out spruce in the Pacific Northwest. There has been organized by this corporation a regular contract board, the functions of which are to make decisions and awards in such cases. It therefore appears as though, should the decisions of this board not be satisfactory to claimants holding contracts, that these claimants would have recourse to the courts, as in the case of any corporation, and the United States Spruce Production Corporation has a separate entity from the United States Government.

In case of intangible claims it is believed that there is no authority of law to pay on same. However, it is the principle of the officers of the United States Spruce Production Corporation to submit a list of worthy claimants to whom it is believed the Government owes a moral obligation.

Your letter has been referred to the United States Spruce Production Corporation and no doubt will receive due consideration.

That second lieutenant seems to take the position that this United States Spruce Production Corporation is an entirely different entity, and I suppose that that is true, although it must have certainly been an agency of the War Department; and he takes the position that if its award or action is not satisfactory these people have a right to go to the Court of Claims. I understood that this bill was to cover situations like that. I really did not know that a corporation had been organized to get out spruce. I am satisfied that a great many people out there thought they were acting directly for the War Department. This writer says in the letter that a great deal of this work was done under the orders of a general officer—Gen. Disque—who was a general in the Army.

I want to be sure that the legislation proposed here would cover cases of that kind, and I desire the opinion of the chairman, because, of course, he has gone into the subject very carefully.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that the bill is broad enough to cover it, but no man can guard any legislation against the decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury. He might rule that such a claim as that did not come within the provisions of the bill. But assuming, as the Senator has said, that the corporation was formed under the law providing therefor, which was suggested by Mr. Ryan, former Assistant Secretary of War, while he was head of the aircraft production, I do not see anything in the bill which would preclude claimants from pursuing their remedies in the civil courts to establish a claim against the Government for the damages that they suffered; and if a claim were established against the corporation it would really be a claim against the Government, and it seems to me that there would be no court which would decline to order the payment. If the claimant preferred to pursue the remedy provided by the present bill, I think he could do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. These people are needing the relief just as much as anybody else covered by the bill. If the other people are not sent to the Court of Claims and to the almost endless operations of the court, these spruce people ought not to be sent there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This corporation was simply an agency of the War Department, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was duly organized; and taking that view of it, it seems to me these persons would come within the provisions of the bill where they had contracted with a governmental agency. And it was a governmental agency; it was established at the request of the War Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator that if the corporation he speaks of is a separate entity, then there can be no question as to the invalid contracts that are taken care of by the bill? Their contracts with a corporation would not be subject to the statutory requirement, and the corporation would settle at once. If they are not a separate entity, then of course they do come under the provision of the bill as an agency of the War Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to call the Senator's attention to the statement contained here in the letter that these people furnished spruce logs at the direct request and under the orders of Gen. Disque, and that a board of award of this corporation is taking the position that they can not recognize any contract that is not a written contract.

Now, I do not want these people to be left out of the provisions of the bill if they are not covered by it because they were getting this spruce, of course, for the War Department, directed to do so by the Government of the United States. They were acting directly under the orders of the Army officials, although those Army officials may have been officials of a corporation that was organized under legislation passed by Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator whether Gen. Disque, in any of those orders, was acting as a member of the corporation or as a member of the War Department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They dealt with him as Gen. Disque, of the War Department, but I presume that really he was an official not only of the War Department but of this corporation that was organized apparently within the War Department. I do not know very much about the organization of the corporation. I did not know that it had been organized until I saw the letter from this second lieutenant of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will look at the first paragraph on page 4 and the first paragraph on page 5, he will see they are very similar and broad enough to cover the case he mentioned. On page 4 it reads:

That whenever during the war emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, any individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign government has made an agreement with the Secretary of War, or with any officer or agent acting under his authority.

If this Spruce Corporation is an agent of the Secretary of War, and unquestionably it is, it comes directly within the provisions of the bill beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to get some expression like that from the members of the committee having the measure in charge. It seems to me that the language of the bill clearly covers this corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As an agency of the War Department?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hardly know how language could be made very much plainer, but I wanted to get some expression from members of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. There would seem to be no question about it, under the policy referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, because the very next clause reads:

Or with any agency of the Government authorized to procure for the War Department.

This was certainly an agency authorized to procure this spruce.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to offer an amendment to section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before we proceed with that the Chair announces that the amendment to section 2 as amended will without objection be agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. May I have the attention of the chairman of the committee? In section 4, line 15, and I am referring to the reprint of this morning, after the word "construed," I move to insert:

To validate any agreement, contract, or order procured by fraud or.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. After line 26, on page 14, I propose the following amendment:

And provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amounts of such partial or final settlement shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or as a public document 10 days before the confirmation and payment is authorized by the board.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that it ought to be necessary to tie up these claims further by the publication of information which can be obtained at any time. I can not say too often and insist too strenuously that this measure is of very vital importance to the industrial and economic life of the country at this time. Here are $2,000,000,000 of capital that ought to be liquid which is absolutely tied up, and many of the industrial corporations that complied with the demands of the Government and came to the relief of the Government at a time when their assistance was needed are in practical bankruptcy now.

Mr. McKELLAR. In view of what the Senator says, if he will allow me to interrupt him, I will perfect the amendment by changing the last line. I will strike out all after the word "document" and add "within 10 days after such confirmation." That is not going to hold up anything at all.

Mr. President, this is a provision of the House bill, and its purpose is to provide for publicity as to these contracts. It is a very valuable provision and it ought to remain in the bill. I do not want to tie them up, and I have changed the language so as to prevent tying up payments at all. What it will do will be to furnish publicity, which after all is the greatest deterrent in the world against fraud and in the matter of deception on the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I still do not see the necessity of putting that amendment on the bill. The information which it is sought to give and the publicity which it is intended it shall give can be obtained at any time by a resolution of the House or Senate or by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses or upon the demand of any Senator or Member of the House, who can call upon the War Department every day or every week if he wants to know the progress of these adjustments. It simply ties up the payment of these claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I take a little different view, possibly it is the wrong view, from the Senator from Tennessee. I believe there is still some honesty in the War Department and in the officials of the Government. I believe that the great mass of men are honest. I believe that this law will be administered honestly and I believe it will be administered efficiently under the stringent provisions of the bill as it has been so far agreed upon. I do hope the Senator will not undertake to further encumber the adjustment of these accounts, which it is absolutely necessary to settle as quickly as possible.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not been able to be present at all the discussion or much of it on these two bills. I am as heartily in sympathy with an early adjustment as possible of these accounts as can be had. I know the necessity of it. I want to ask the Senator from Oregon if he can tell me in a few words the difference between the Hitchcock bill and the committee bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is going to offer his amendment and he will point out the differences, I think, from his viewpoint, and I shall be glad to make a statement in reply.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I assume the Senator from Nebraska is going to do that now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my intention.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure the Senator from Michigan will have the differences pointed out.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, with reference to the pending amendment, I will say I am in accord with the Senator from Oregon. I wish the Senator from Tennessee could see his way clear to omit the amendment, because, as the Senator from Oregon has pointed out, it is information available to any Senator or available to Congress at any time. To provide in the law that the whole detailed statement, giving the names of all the contractors and the amounts of the partial or final settlements, shall be filed with the Clerk of the House and published for the information of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD within a limited time, 10 days after the confirmation of the settlement, seems to me to be an unnecessary requirement.

I have no objection to the publicity idea, and I think perhaps all this information will either actually be called for, and it can be called for; but why put in a provision of that kind and impose upon the board and the machinery here organized for the adjustment of these claims all this work and require them to do it within a limited time after the confirmation of the settlement? I think it is unnecessary, and it will simply impose additional work and a lot of details that the situation does not call for.

I would be glad if the Senator from Tennessee would withdraw the amendment and let us vote on the bill. His amendment requires that within 10 days after the confirmation of any of the settlements or adjustments a detailed report must be made. Does not that hold up the entire work?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator did not read the amendment. It does not apply to that at all. It provides that they shall merely report within 10 days after the confirmation. I have changed the language of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the change the Senator made was not to strike out "ten days" but to strike out the word "before" and insert the word "after."

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is very different; it strikes out the word "payment." The payment can be made just as it is under the bill. It does not interfere with payment at all, but merely gives the country and Congress information as to what is done.

Mr. FLETCHER. But it must be all furnished 10 days after confirmation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. I take it the Senator would not believe that it would do any good if furnished 10 years after confirmation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course not, but it is to be furnished 10 days after the confirmation of such contracts. You can not make a settlement with A; you can not make a settlement with B; you can not close any transaction at all; you have got to wait until all the contracts are adjusted and then make the settlement.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not understand the amendment. It does not provide any such thing. Those words have been stricken out. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment, and I am sure the Senator will find that his objections to it are wholly without any ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 26, page 14, of the reprint, following the word "agreement" and before the period, insert:

And provided further, That the names of such contractors and the amount of such final or partial settlement shall be filed with the Clerk of the House for the information of Congress and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the Official Bulletin or as a public document within ten days after such confirmation.

Mr. FLETCHER. That means exactly what I said, that we have got to take the names of all the contractors and the names and amounts for such partial or final settlement, and all those must be filed with the Clerk of the House or otherwise be disposed of according to the amendment within 10 days after such confirmation. In other words, it seems to me that you can not close with one contractor or with two or three contractors, but you must wait until you are prepared to file this statement, and it must be done within 10 days after all the adjustments are made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the criticism of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Oregon applies to the part that is stricken out of this amendment. This is a House provision, and it is reasonable to suppose that the House had some purpose in adopting it. It is a very wise amendment.

The Senator from Oregon says he still believes that there are some people who are honest. I do, too; but we are providing for those who may be dishonest, and there may be some. There have been some in the past. We are enacting this kind of a law every day. If all people were absolutely honest we would not need laws of this kind; we could just proceed without them.

This is a reasonable provision, and I will say to the Senator that it is a very necessary provision. It will take very little time to put in the names of the contractors, and the amounts that contractors have received at the hands of the Government, and have it published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the Official Bulletin. I want to stop here long enough to say that I struck out the words "Official Bulletin," because I do not think that they ought to be there. I do not think that publicity would be sufficient, but it will be the simplest matter to comply with it. It puts no hardship on the contractor, and surely no contractor in the country is going to object to publicity as to the amount paid him.

I am standing by the contractor. I do not believe that any honest contractor in this country will for a moment object to having his name put in the RECORD with the amount that has been paid to him. I know they will not do it, and I am surprised at Senators saying that it is a reflection upon the contractor. They should be delighted to have the amount published and their names published showing what they received. No honest contractor will object to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he means that adjustment and settlement be made with contractors, say one, two, three, four, or five, and then that communications be sent to Congress giving the lists of names, the amounts, and so forth?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, that is all it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, that would mean that the department must be continually sending down lists of contractors with whom the department has settled?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course; and that is what the departments are for.

Mr. FLETCHER. And that may either be published in the shape of a public document or in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly. I am sure when the Senator comes to think about it he will not object, and that no other Senator will object to a provision which is so manifestly right and proper when we realize how much money is going to be paid out upon these contracts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is lost.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to my colleague, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I ask if the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WARREN. Then I withhold my vote, as I have a pair with that Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. POLLOCK. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is detained on account of illness. I should like this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	Curtis	Hale	King
Bankhead	Fernald	Hardwick	La Follette
Beckham	France	Henderson	Lenroot

So Mr. McKELLAR's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have been detained from the Senate on business and do not know whether or not the amendment to this bill proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I offer to add, as an amendment at the end of that amendment as adopted, what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment submitted by Mr. HENDERSON it is proposed to add—

That the importation of Egyptian long-staple cotton into the United States is hereby prohibited for the term of six months from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, we see in the adoption of the Henderson amendment, as I will call it, and the amendment which I have proposed, the ramifications of that injustice which has been done under the cry of necessity for instant preparation for the greatest war in the history of all time. I am not here complaining of any mistakes which have been made; I only wonder that more have not been made, when we stop to consider the enormous responsibilities which have been resting on the Government and on the country.

Take the question which my amendment is supposed to cover—and it is not a part of the Henderson amendment, but is a mere addition at the end of that amendment in the pending bill. The United States commandeered, as I understand, all the spindles that were used in the weaving or the spinning of long staple cotton. The growth of that commodity is limited to a small point in the State of South Carolina, I think; to the southern part of the State of California; and to a large part of the irrigable lands in Arizona. Agents of the Government from the different departments went to the people of Arizona who were raising this cotton and insisted that it was just as important to raise long staple cotton as it was to contribute to a liberty loan. They were told that they were standing there doing nothing while their boys were fighting for their country in Europe; that they could raise cotton there which it was necessary for the Government to have. That cotton has been proven to be the strongest-fibered cotton in the world; it is not of the highest grade in some particulars, but in fiber it is the strongest cotton in the world. Those people were told to put in every acre of that cotton they could; that the Government would need it for gas masks which were found to be superior to any other in the world; and that the Government would need it, especially on account of the strength of its fiber, in airplanes, in balloons, and in all of those aerial necessities which became so important as the war advanced.

Acting under that suggestion, the people of my particular locality—the people of Salt River Valley—almost quintupled, and certainly quadrupled, the planting of this variety of cotton. That was done under the influence of those who had come from the United States Government, putting the argument in the terms I have already stated, but, as I believe, in a much stronger way.

Now, the question arises as to the commandeering of the spindles which afforded the only market for this cotton. There was the persuasion of the agents of the United States to those people to put more and more—every available acre—of their land into this cotton for Government purposes, with the assurance—I can not say there was any absolute guarantee, but with the assurance—that they could not lose on it.

But the armistice came; the war stopped, and these people are now left with the cotton crop of two years on their hands, which was selling, before the Government commandeered these spindles, at 70 cents a pound. Since then, with the cotton there, the cotton weavers have concluded that they will not pay 70 cents, or any other number of cents, per pound for the cotton. The result is that the owners of the cotton are subject to any reduction in price which the cotton spinners may now impose upon them.

This proposed inhibition of the importation of Egyptian cotton is not in any sense the imposition of a protective duty. It is the only way I can conceive whereby these cotton raisers can obtain redress from a condition which the persuasion of the agents of the Government brought upon them, which induced them to put all they had into cotton. However, it means bankruptcy if this remedial legislation is not adopted. They have been placed in their present position by an effort to help the Government in the hour of its need. I think there are some 35,000 bales, probably 70,000 bales, being imported from Egypt for the very purpose of enabling the spinners to take advantage of this condition and thus bankrupting these men; and yet the Government of the United States stands aside and permits the introduction of this competing cotton into the United States. This is evidently wrong. It seems to me that some obligation rests on the Government to protect these cotton growers from that calamity.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Senator from Arizona makes out a pretty strong case, but would the Senator be willing to incorporate in his amendment a nonimportation clause for wool also?

Mr. GAY. And for sugar?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No, I would not, for I do not know that wool, according to the prices, has suffered any and I do not know that sugar has suffered any.

Mr. BORAH. But here is the situation with reference to wool: The Government took over the wool, has possession and control of it, and now is not only selling its wool at auction to the manufacturers but is permitting the importation of wool from other countries, which destroys entirely the wool market of the western woolgrower.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That may be very true; but there was no effort made by the United States Government to induce the growing of wool in one particular part of the country where only a certain peculiar kind of wool could be grown, a kind that could only be used for certain articles essential to the Government. The Senator's illustration is much too broad for him to attempt to apply it to the remedy that I am now seeking.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Arizona wants to be correct in any statement that he makes. I desire to say to him that the Government of the United States bought every pound of wool that was produced in the United States during the year 1918, and it finds itself now with 400,000,000 pounds of wool on hand. The program at first was to throw the wool on the market and sell it for whatever it would bring, or, in other words, to salvage it. The woolgrower had been encouraged in every possible way to produce every pound of mutton and every pound of wool that he could produce, without guaranty as to prices. So far as last year's clip was concerned, the prices paid were satisfactory under conditions existing, although if they had been allowed to sell at the world's market prices they would have received much more than they did.

Mr. SMITH of Ariozna. Now, will the Senator permit me right there to ask him what relation that bears to the matter I am discussing? Why, in the argument that I am attempting to make for the relief of suffering people, should there be injected the question of wool or of wheat? Whatever was done with them has been done. The wool has been bought under guaranty, and it is held under guaranty, which applies to the whole production of the United States. There was not a separate distinct quality of wool that the Government had to have in order to carry on the war itself, as was the case with the long-staple cotton to which I have referred.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Government did not only have to have one grade of wool, but it had to have every grade of wool.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand that; and that wool was grown everywhere.

Mr. SMOOT. That makes no difference where the wool was grown.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it does not, the Senator and I can not see an argument when it faces us.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked me what relation the wool had to the cotton. This is the relation: They are both used for the manufacture of cloth——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Long-staple wool and short-staple wool are grown in every State of the Union. They have no relation at all to the particular kind of cotton to which I am referring, grown nowhere in the world except in Egypt and in certain small areas in the United States, and an absolute essential to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, long-staple wool is not essential in war any more than the short-staple wool; in fact——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that, and neither one of those commodities has anything to do with this case. They are both like the "flowers that bloom in the spring."

Mr. SMOOT. If they have nothing to do with the case, I do not see why there should be any legislation to affect any of them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not asking for any legislation in regard to short-staple wool, or any of the other matters of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of short-staple cotton and long-staple cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My amendment has not a thing to do with short-staple cotton. I would not have a word to say if it was the short-staple cotton that was affected.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I presume not; but I can not see a particle of difference between cotton and wool.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, I can; and that is the difference between us.

Mr. SMOOT. The Government owns 400,000,000 pounds of wool, and they are going to sell it in competition with the woolgrower the coming year. The domestic production of long-staple cotton, what little there is of it raised in the United States, will only answer the demand of America to a limited extent; whereas the 400,000,000 pounds of wool on hand will be about all domestic wool that will be consumed within the coming year.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How does the Senator know what the Government proposes to do with the wool?

Mr. SMOOT. I know, because the sales have been advertised, and some of them have already taken place.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, then, I presume the wool which the Government bought at a good high price has been sold at a good high price, for I have not seen any very serious decline in that market.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of what the Government owns now; it is a question of what effect the prices obtained at forced sales of wool will have upon the wool that is yet to be grown and clipped this year.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand that; but I am not talking about wool, which, I repeat to the Senator, can be grown and sold in every State of the Union and imported from practically every country on earth. I am talking about a specific commodity, the production of which is confined to a limited number of acres and which the Government has simply set aside for its own use.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the price fixed for wool was with the consent of the woolgrowers?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably.

Mr. FLETCHER. And under agreement with the woolgrowers?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say, in answer to the Senator, that if the Government had not controlled the price of wool, wool would have advanced to a dollar a pound.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not questioning that; but I am saying that an agreement between the woolgrowers and the Government was reached as to the price. That is how it was adjusted.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to say further, as the Senator from Utah speaks about the domestic production of long-staple cotton being only sufficient to supply in a limited way the demands of the country, that, as a matter of fact, the sea-island cotton growers, the long-staple cotton growers, have last year's crop largely on hand and this year's crop in the warehouse. The demand for cotton here is not equal to the supply; there is produced in this country more than the country needs, and to some extent it is exported; but not only is the home market for our home product taken away from us by the importation of Egyptian cotton but the price is reduced to a point where the grower can not produce it. That is the situation with reference to long-staple cotton. When we were short in tonnage, when the world was crying and begging for ships, the ships were used to bring in 90,000 bales of Egyptian cotton, 750 pounds to the bale, last year, to take the market away from the long-staple cotton growers in our country. That is the fact about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Florida——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have the floor, Mr. President, and I decline to wait until this debate is ended.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me to answer one of the statements made by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; I will yield to the Senator once more.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say, in answer to the Senator from Florida, that so far as the wool growers of this country are concerned, they were asked to send representatives here and agree upon a price with the Government. No objection was voiced on the floor of the Senate to the Government compelling in a way the wool producers to accept the price put upon wool, but when the question of putting a price upon cotton was raised in this country there was an objection from every cotton State in the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What has that to do with this argument? The Senator insists on putting all the objections and criticisms he can possibly find into my contention for an absolutely just and equitable provision.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, without regard to the cotton end of this colloquy, I wish to say that the RECORD should show a correct statement about wool. The Senator from Florida is mistaken in supposing that the Government entered into an agreement with the wool men that was satisfactory to them. The Government insisted that the woolgrowers should handle their wool in a certain way, but did not make any price. The Government insisted that the most it would do would be to act with the dealers, that there would have to be licenses for them to sell any wool; that growers could ship the wool to the commission men, and that the Government would then examine the wool, grade it, and pay whatever the price was supposed to be on the 30th day of the previous June, which was 10 to 25 per cent less than the market was on the day that this proposition was made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will let me finish——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But I care nothing about the wool situation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I presume the Senator does not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, we raise as much wool in my section of the country as is raised in the Senator's section.

Mr. WARREN. I wish that were true, but it is slightly incorrect. I shall finish my remarks unless the Senator requests me not to do so.

Now, so far so good. The wool of last year went to the Government, the cessation of the war prevented the use of the larger share of it, and the Government was overstocked.

The Senator states that there was no encouragement offered the woolgrowers to increase sheep and wool. On the contrary, the Agricultural Department of the Government has been urging repeatedly and insistently, month after month for more than two years, that there should be more sheep and wool grown; the matter has been advertised, and inducements and enticements have been given for men to raise more and more.

I have not said anything about cotton, and I am not going to do so; that stands by itself; but I want the RECORD to show the wool situation correctly. The wool men have been in exactly the same condition as are the long-staple cotton growers, so far as being encouraged to grow a great crop is concerned. That crop is now a surplus, and is not only being sold to-day at auction but it is understood—in fact, the Government has stated positively—that it will be sold from time to time at a rate as nearly as possible like that which wool brings in foreign countries.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I hope there is no man with better temper or with more patience than myself, but I give warning now that I will not be interrupted by any other woolgrower nor anyone else who seeks to apply to wool the argument that I am attempting to make. Everybody in the two Houses of Congress knows the history of wool for the last 60 years, and everyone knows, coming to politics, that as soon as the miserable prohibitory tariff was taken off of wool that commodity went up. That is going to settle the wool argument so far as I am concerned.

Mr. President, let me get back to my argument. The growers of long-staple cotton, to whom I have referred, acting under the impetus given by the Government and under the implied promise of the Government, exerted themselves to produce this cotton. It was at the time selling for 70 cents a pound, and to-day in the open market it is worth 70 cents a pound; but the gentlemen who do the spinning, relying on an importation from Egypt through England, are disposed to wait until they can supply themselves with the cheaper Egyptian cotton, after the farmers in the Salt River Valley and those in southern California spent as much as $5 a day for a man to pick cotton, and an inexperienced picker at that, on land that would pay them $200 an acre for hay alone. They responded to the plea made to them, quadrupled the planting of cotton, and now, following the armistice, they find themselves left without a market, with two years' cotton on their hands, and with the prospect of being absolutely ruined by the importation of Eyptian cotton through England.

My amendment only goes to the question of stopping that importation for six months, to squeeze the gentlemen who are trying to beat these men down to a price that they will pay, the legitimate price, for that sort of cotton in the industries that they are now conducting. That can be done by stopping the importation for six months, and then they will come and give the usual price for this cotton. If you do not do it, they will stand and absolutely be smothered by the Egyptian-raised cotton imported into the United States, I should like to say to my friend the Senator from Utah, imported without any duty on earth, and that against men paying $5 a day for labor to pick it alone.

I ask that that importation be prohibited for six months. A limited portion of South Carolina, probably one of the other Southern States, and every one of the western-southern growers of cotton, as I said, quadrupled the amount of their land devoted to it for the purpose of meeting the Government's demand; and when the armistice is declared they get notice that the Government does not want it and will not take it! I am simply asking that that importation be stopped until these men have a chance at the market; and these gentlemen will sell their woven long-staple goods at just as high a price with the Egyptian product as they will sell them with the Arizona product paid the legitimate 70 cents a pound.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are adjusting the rights of people we should look a little to those in my country, who have gone away beyond every demand of this Government in every liberty loan, who have gone away beyond every demand of the Red Cross, who have gone beyond every demand of any people asking money for the purpose of protecting our wounded or caring for our sick on the battle fields of Europe. I am asking for this measure of relief for those induced by the Government to plant this cotton, and then ruined by the Government through the importation of English cotton.

My friends, it seems to me that no stronger appeal could be made under any sort of case than is made by these people, who, under what they call the hottest sun in the world, are striving every day of their lives to convert the desert into habitable homes. And now, when they have contributed liberally to every relief the Government ever asked, and have made an oversubscription, and a large oversubscription, to liberty bonds—I think probably exceeding, taking it county by county, any State in the Union—when we come to the staple product of all those men, who contributed largely, many of them borrowing the money on their cotton crops, to buy great amounts of Government bonds, they are to be told: "Your market is to be killed, your money to be taken from you, that the Egyptian cotton grower or the American spinner may use your disaster to his own advantage."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish the Senate to understand distinctly the difference between long-staple cotton and cotton as it is ordinarily termed.

The amendment of the Senator from Arizona applies to long-staple cotton. It is as different from the ordinary lint cotton, the great southern crop, as wool is different from long-staple cotton. It is raised largely in southern California, in Arizona, somewhat upon the coast of South Carolina, a small amount—probably 20,000 bales—in the coast counties of Georgia, and some in Florida. The total production of long-staple cotton in the United States amounts, I think, to about 200,000 or 250,000 bales.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it is quite that much.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Probably about 200,000 bales; and this amendment does not apply to the great cotton crop of over 11,000,000 bales. This amendment proposing to protect long-staple cotton comes from the Senator from Arizona. It does not come from the southern cotton growers, seeking protection for their crop. But I want to mention to you a few facts about long-staple cotton, and the just complaint that the people of Arizona and southern California and other long-staple cotton growers have with reference to it as compared with other cotton.

Ninety thousand bales of Egyptian long-staple cotton, 750 pounds to the bale, have been admitted to the United States by the War Trade Board this year already. They admitted freely Egyptian long-staple cotton, while they were refusing licenses and restricting licenses for the exportation of our great short-staple crop. The War Trade Board, as late as the latter part of November, was rationing even Spain in its consumption of cotton, limiting exportation to 35,000 bales a month and requiring the shipper, before he could obtain a license to export, to show the name of the manufacturer to whom he had sold the cotton and to further show that the manufacturer was not receiving more than his pro rata of the amount that was being rationed to Spain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does not the Senator think he should say, on behalf of the judgment of the War Trade Board, that the enormous demand was for cargo space going to Europe for export, and it was difficult to find any space in export cargo but a comparatively easy matter to find space in ships coming to the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there was not cargo space going to Europe, why did they restrict the licensing of cotton going abroad? If we could not get the cargo space to go to Spain, why refuse to permit our cotton growers and our cotton merchants licenses to export if they could get the space? I do not think the Senator from Nebraska is right about it. I think it was a deliberate purpose to restrict shipments of short-staple cotton.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not deny that our exports are enormously in excess of our imports, and have been for the last three or four years, and that it has been a much harder matter to find cargo space for export purposes than cargo space for import purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was undoubtedly true before the armistice, but not since; but when the cotton merchant found his space and had his ship there was no reason why he should not have been given a license to ship his cargo; and my complaint is that when cotton merchants had the ships and were prepared to export, the War Trade Board restricted the trade and suppressed exportation without just cause, to the damage of one-fourth of the country at least and, indirectly, to the damage of the entire country, because the exported cotton sold abroad at liberal prices would help make our international balances and bring back gold to enrich and give vitality and life to all the industries of the country.

I do not know that this amendment would help much the people of Arizona now, because 90,000 bales of 750 pounds each of long-staple cotton have already been brought in; but the rationing of Spain in November to 35,000 bales a month, and requiring the party shipping to show a manufacturer as purchaser before a license would be issued, and that the manufacturer only had his pro rata portion, was utterly indefensible. Why?

The excuse was given that they were afraid Spain would accumulate a large amount of lint cotton and, after the blockade was raised and the war was over, sell it to Germany. Well, why should they not do so? If the blockade was raised and the war was over, and, according to the agreements settling the peace terms, Germany or Austria was entitled to buy cotton, if Spain wanted to buy it in the meantime and accumulate it, why should she not do it?

The trouble is that whenever you suppress an exportation of an American product by regulation, while you may injure an enemy abroad or you may interfere with somebody's foreign trade, you certainly strike a blow at your American producer as well. I view this subject from the standpoint of American interests. I view the right to do an export trade, not in the interest of the foreign country that buys but in the interest of the American exporter who sells; and, again, when we buy from a foreign country we buy because we believe the product will help our own country; and, again, if our citizens desire to buy I view it from the standpoint of the interest of the American citizen who desires the product, and if the product is needed here you injure our country by hindering importation.

The Senator from Utah said that the suggestion of fixing a price on cotton raised objection from all over the country. I wish he would mention the exact time to which he refers. Does the Senator refer to the proposed price-fixing by the War Trade Board last fall?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to reply, then, briefly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not deny the fact that there was a discussion as to the fixing of a price?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly there was; and I wish to make a few remarks on that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator objected, and I had no objection to his objecting.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to make just a few remarks upon that subject. I wish to show that it was right to object and protest against the proposed price fixing referred to by the Senator from Utah.

The War Trade Board had as much right to fix a price on cotton last fall as the man in the moon had, and no more, and it had no more power to maintain the price if fixed.

Mr. SMOOT. And they had just the same right to fix it on cotton as they had on wool.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The relation was entirely different. They had no right to fix the price on wool.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They did not. They agreed with the woolgrower as to what the Government would pay for the wool that the Government bought. They did not fix the price on wool except in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, they demanded that they buy every pound of wool produced in the United States; and not only that, but no one was allowed to buy a pound of wool unless he was licensed by the Federal Trade Board, nor could he sell a pound.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was there any act of Congress authorizing such a procedure?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I have not said that they were authorized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They had no more right to prevent you from selling where you pleased than I have, as a private citizen, if no act of Congress controlled the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. But they did say to every dealer and to every person in the United States, "You can not buy a pound of wool unless you hold a license for it, nor can you sell a pound of it unless you are granted a license."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Government traded with the woolgrowers and agreed on a price.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I know the Senator wants to be right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WARREN. That is not quite correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What was the price they agreed on?

Mr. WARREN. No price whatever was agreed upon, except that, as the Senator said a moment ago, they first said that unless the United States Government's proposition was accepted by the wool men they would provide that nothing could be done in the wool business except under license. That was the first proposition. The second proposition was that if the woolgrowers could find ways to raise the money by shipping their wool through commission houses the Government would then grade that wool, or have it graded, and have it appraised, and would pay then, as near as could be on each grade determined, the rate of the year before on the 30th of June. The wool men, after a few days' consideration, said that although there was no law for it, they understood the power of the Government to destroy the market; and while they felt that it was too low, they were willing to accept it if the Government would protect the market until it became normal again, which the Government, of course, has not yet done. They discovered a willingness on the part of the War Industries Board to support the market for another year by asking Congress to continue the powers of the War Board through the year to enable them to do it, which I believe was finally considered unconstitutional, and it has fallen to the ground, and wool with it; and the wool will have to go on to the market for whatever it will bring.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I am really interested in doing just at this time is protesting against any authority placed in the Government anywhere to take any private citizen's goods at an arbitrary price. I deny that the Government can legally do it, or that Congress can give them the right to do it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right about that; but under the circumstances, with the war on, they could during active war indirectly accomplish exactly what they sought to do; and the growers of wool, as patriotic as the cotton growers and as all other people in the country, simply accepted the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I regret to have an impression go over this country that we live under a Constitution that allows Congress or the administration to take the property of a private citizen at an arbitrary price. It "riles" me to have the suggestion made.

Mr. WARREN. I want to agree with the Senator just as emphatically as he has stated the matter, but I think the Senator will remember that we sang very low and whispered rather than shouted and did pretty much as we were commanded to do during the stress of war, and I do not know that we regret it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and it is a marvelous record of patriotism by the people of this country—their willingness or their readiness, without complaint, to submit to things that I do not think ought to have been done in many instances.

Mr. WARREN. High and low, without regard to parties, vocations, or circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I just did not wish to let the opportunity pass without expressing my protest against the view that the Government can arbitrarily take any man's property by a price fixed either through Congress or through the President.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may be valuable in the future to have it known that no such power is vested in our Government.

I wish to say that one of the most remarkable occurrences of this character happened with regard to linters in connection with cotton. Linters were selling at about 6 or 7 cents a pound. Linters are the small fibers scraped at the cotton-oil mill from cotton seed, left on the seed by the cotton gin. The gin takes off the spinnable cotton; and this substance, called linter, is a very small, fine fiber that is not removed by the gin and can not be spun.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Just a fuzz on the seed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They were selling for about 6½ or 7 cents a pound when the Government determined, with the war inaugurated, that the Government needed linters to make munitions. The Government went further. It determined that it wanted more linters than the seed normally scraped would produce, and desired part of the hull scraped off, adding a sharp fiber, which made the linters more valuable for munition purposes, and the oil men put in machinery for the purpose. They agreed first with the War Industries Board on a price of 4.62 cents per pound, substantially less than the market price. They at once put in the machinery preparatory to producing these additional linters, and they made a sort of a contract for the sale of their linters. After the armistice came about it was really an amusing thing to see the kind of contracts they had made. A little organization had made the contract for all of it for the Government. They had no contract with the Government that was worth anything, and the little concern that had made it could not have financed any of it; and yet these splendid business men just absolutely took anything they were told to take and did anything they were called upon to do, and the explanation of it was, "We did not consider our rights. We were told by our Government that something was needed of us, and we proposed to carry it through"; and I have no doubt the wool men were moved in very much the same way.

Mr. WARREN. It was all "the war." Everything in the last two years up to the time of the armistice has been "the war." The swing of the small whip, the words "it is for the war," have been all that was necessary to carry through almost anything, no matter how absurd or expensive, and have it become the law of the land for the time being.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, I have come down to the remark of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], to which I wish to refer and which I desire to distinguish from all these other conditions.

The wool was needed by the Government, and the wool men gave it up for whatever the Government called on them to give it up for. The cotton linters were needed by the Government, and the oil men and the cotton men gave it up, under contracts that were worth little, after expending large sums of money to fit their oil mills to handle it, and I approved their patriotic course; but when the proposition was made for the War Industries Board to raid the ordinary lint cotton the Government was not using a bale of it. The Government did not want a bale of it. The Government never has taken a bale of it. The Government had bought its supplies of cotton manufactured goods by contract from cotton manufacturers. They bought the cotton. The entire Government consumption would not amount to 10 per cent of the cotton crop. The Government consumption, I am informed, would not amount to 10 per cent of the lint cotton raised in our country. Now, when they proposed for the War Industries Board to fix the price of lint cotton the Government did not intend to buy it and stabilize the price. It did not offer to. It did not have any need for it. There was no act of Congress authorizing the Government to underwrite the price, and I want the Senator from Utah to follow my distinction.

It occupied an entirely different situation from the linters. The Government wanted none of it. It did not intend to buy a bale of it. It had no authority to underwrite the price of a bale. It was in the market for none of it; and for the War Industries Board to undertake to fix a price upon a commodity which the Government did not need nor wish to use, which the Government was not authorized to buy, and which, if the Government fixed a price upon it, it had no authority to maintain, was arbitrary and indefensible. I said at the time that the Government could not fix a price on cotton that anybody was obliged to take or that anybody was obliged to pay. The Government itself needed none of it and was not going to buy any of it, so the Government was not in the market to maintain the price at all; and the whole suggestion and the whole movement was inexcusable. I knew that if they fixed a price nobody would be obliged to sell at it and nobody would be obliged to pay it.

As to the linters, the situation was entirely different. The Government needed them, and I helped induce and advised those producing linters to do whatever the Government wanted and let the Government have them; but the lint cotton proper occupied an entirely different situation, and therefore I did without hesitation say that the suggestion was preposterous. If the Government had wanted 10,000,000 or 6,000,000 bales of the cotton, then the situation would have been entirely different.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not sure that I see the connection between the proposition which is pending and this bill; but I want to ask the Senator from Georgia, who knows so well about the cotton situation, if we import any long-staple cotton from any other locality than Egypt?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think not.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason why I am led to ask that question is that we have a rather serious trade complication pending now relative to action taken by Great Britain prohibiting the importation of shoes into Great Britain. That was taken as a war measure, I understand. The United States in the past has sold very considerable quantities of shoes to Great Britain. At least half a dozen of the large manufacturers have maintained stores there, some of them several stores, and they feel materially the effects of this prohibition. If we prohibited the import of long-staple cotton, does the Senator believe that it would have any effect on this prohibition of the importation of shoes into Great Britain?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that the brightest traders in the world live on British Isles, and they will always take care of themselves; and if they have something that they wish to sell you that you will not buy unless they give you a chance to sell to their people what you wish to sell, I think they could undoubtedly be reached by action of that character.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I presume this may sound a little like a foolish question; but I presume the Senator would object to a prohibition of the exportation of our cotton to Great Britain for 30 days, or thereabouts, until some arrangement was made about the shoe question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly would, because that would do a great injustice to our people.

Mr. WEEKS. But the Senator does think that if we prohibited the importation of long-staple cotton it might have some influence in adjusting the other question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the suspension of the exportation of short-staple cotton would have a tremendous influence upon it.

Mr. WEEKS. I suppose it would.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that to suspend the shipment of foodstuffs to Great Britain would have even a controlling effect. I think we are in a position absolutely to make Great Britain treat us fairly in all matters of trade if we have the nerve and force to do it. I would think it improper to pick one product of the United States, to the exclusion of all others; but if it were deemed advisable to say that no American products should go to Great Britain until she admitted our shoes and other products fairly, I would be willing for cotton to take its place among all the others and bear its part of the burden. I would not be willing for it to be singled out to be deprived of a market unless we followed the same course as to other commodities.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have listened to a portion of the argument of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I have not been making an argument.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator has been making a very persuasive one. It has been so persuasive and so eloquent that I am inclined to think that perhaps other products ought not to be overlooked, and I suggest to him the advisability of including in the amendment the words "potash, manganese, and pyrites," because those products are in substantially the same situation as the products for which the Senator has been contending. I ask the Senator if he will consent that those words be added to the amendment, after the word "potash"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is not my amendment. It is the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. I have not been speaking in behalf of the amendment. I have been speaking really as the result of a remark made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the suggestion of putting a price on cotton raised great objection from all over the country. I wanted to take this opportunity of drawing a distinction between the status of cotton and many other commodities which the Government handled, and to justify the position which I took last September, when the President and the War Trade Board broke the price of cotton to the injury of the South of $500,000,000. Cotton was selling at 38 cents a pound when they undertook to interfere with it. They announced that they were going to fix the price or stabilize it or regulate the sale of it or create a single purchasing agent who should buy for our allies and all purchasing supplies in our country, thereby eliminating all competition among purchasers in the United States, and thereby forgetting that the Sherman Antitrust Act was ever passed. When that was done they broke the price of cotton. They broke the market and drove it down to a loss on the crop of over $500,000,000.

Then, finally, when they announced at the end of about six weeks that they had nothing to do with it, that they had no power to fix the price, no power to maintain a price, no money with which to buy any of it, no desire to buy any of it, the War Trade Board stepped in and was restricting the issue of licenses and checking the export of cotton.

I condemned, then, the talk of price fixing for cotton, because, really, they had no power to do it. I knew they would not buy it. I knew the Government did not buy it. I knew the Government had no money to buy it with, and it could not make anybody use it, and could not make anybody buy it, and that the suggested manipulation of the crop would break the market down, as it did. I was not discussing the merits of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. I have pointed out the unauthorized interference with cotton, to the damage of the cotton grower and our entire country.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Arizona is willing to include wool.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I have told three or four Senators that I am not. I should like to have a vote on the amendment. I expect in the heat of debate, as we often do, I may have referred somewhat roughly to the fact that I would not be interrupted any more in this particular argument by the question of wool. If I have any number of friends anywhere in the world it is among the woolgrowers of Arizona. If I have political friends anywhere in the world, even my attitude on free wool never broke them down in their kindness to me. So no accidental or unthoughted remark of mine in debate could be construed by the Senator from Wyoming, with whom I have been acquainted in public life for over 30 years, or my friend from Utah, who knows my kindliness toward him, to be any lack of appreciation of my friends. I publicly express my apology, if such is necessary, and disclaim any intent of ever having alluded in any but the kindliest and the pleasantest terms to either of the friends I have mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, while this discussion is intensely interesting, I do hope we may be able to get a vote on the bill to-night so that it may go to conference. Therefore I ask that we may have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did have the intention of referring to some statements that have been made here to-day, but I do not think any good would come from a discussion of the merits of the protection of the wool interests and the long-staple cotton growers of the country. We know that both of them find themselves in a rather precarious situation. I do not know what is going to happen to the woolgrowers of this country in the coming year. Nobody can tell; nor can I say what is going to happen to the long-staple cotton growers of the country; nor, Mr. President, can I say what is going to happen to the general business of the country. I have taken a little of the time of the Senate in the past to call attention to facts and to express the opinion that it will not be long before there will be a great deal of suffering not only among the growers of wool and cotton but among the laborers of the country as well. Conditions are such that it could hardly be otherwise.

So whatever has been said here to-day I know that the Senator from Arizona will not claim that it has been said in any spirit of criticism. The statement made by the Senator from Arizona in relation to long-staple cotton embraced facts that I am fully aware of. I know what an important crop it is. I have bought hundreds and hundreds of bales of it and used it in the manufacture of what we term tricot longs, sold in this country from one end to the other.

I think the Senator from Arizona perhaps will remember that upon this floor I have stated time and time again that a thousand times rather would I as a manufacturer use long-staple cotton than the mungo and shoddy that is used so much by manufacturers of woolen goods in the United States, and not only in the United States but in all the world.

So, Mr. President, when the amendment was offered I immediately thought, as I stated, of the condition of the woolgrower. I immediately thought of our potash producers in the State of Utah. I immediately thought of the manganese miners of the country, who by the Government were pleaded with and almost commanded to open their properties and who borrowed money and erected plants to produce it because it was wanted so badly by the Government for carrying on the war.

Mr. President, I know men who have not only put every cent they have on earth in the plant, but they have borrowed every cent they could from their friends and put up everything in the way of security they had for the loans they had to make. I wish to say that those same men had scarcely produced the first carload of manganese ore before the armistice was signed, and they were closed down.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know three men in my State who put up $200,000 that they had of their own and borrowed $500,000, and now unless the Government accepts it as a burden upon all the people they will lose it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only one case out of hundreds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They did it at the earnest request of the Government for immediate action, stating that the legislation was going to be passed and that they must not wait until the legislation which authorized the contract was passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The wool situation and the long-staple cotton situation, of course, are both very serious. I think, aside from all humorous remarks, we all concede that to be the case. But could it not all be remedied by appropriating $100,000,000 and purchasing the wool upon hand and keep the people of Europe from freezing to death? It seems to me that while it is yet difficult to get through a nonimportation clause we would not have any difficulty in passing an appropriation bill to buy the wool and the long-staple cotton, and why not buy the manganese and potash? There is no bottom to the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think the destitute of Europe require it?

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator asks that as a general question.

Mr. BORAH. I ask it as a general question, and I ask it as a serious question, because the precedent in that respect has been established.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is quite a difference between buying food—for a person has to have food or starve to death—and giving a man a new suit of clothes where he has an old suit to keep him warm.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose he has no suit at all?

Mr. SMOOT. Then I think the country in which he lives should take care of him and clothe him.

Mr. BORAH. It is not only a question of humanity, but a question of decency.

Mr. SMOOT. I know exactly how the Senator from Idaho feels in relation to the $100,000,000 appropriation, and I want to say, as I said the other day, that I sympathize with him a great deal in what he said.

Mr. BORAH. I am trying now to invoke the precedent. I want the benefit of the combined wisdom of 53 votes. I am perfectly willing to surrender my judgment and have the precedent carried to its lawful conclusion and take care of the wool men, because they will be ruined, there is no doubt about it, and to take care of the cotton men, and to take care of the potash men. There is one way to do it, and that is to appropriate money and buy the product.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to suggest that the Senator from Utah ought to include the hog men as well. They may suffer because the price of hogs may go down presently.

Mr. SMOOT. They will not suffer in the price of hogs, at least for the month of February, because I notice in the morning press that the price will be 17½ cents for the month of February.

Mr. CUMMINS. They will want it after February.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; but I say there is quite a difference between financial ruin and death. I would a thousand times rather lose every dollar I have on earth than to lose my life. I take it for granted that the $100,000,000 that was appropriated was for the purpose of saving lives. Nobody will lose his life if the Government does not appropriate for the purchase of wool and nobody will lose his life if we do not purchase the manganese or the potash. That is the difference.

Now, I ask the Senator from Arizona if he wants a separate vote on his amendment without putting potash and manganese and pyrites and wool upon it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should very much prefer a vote on my amendment, because I believe——

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to have the Senate vote on the amendment. Then if the Senate agrees to it, I wish to say to the Senator I shall reserve the right to offer an amendment to the amendment, because that certainly can not hurt, and the whole question then will be in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I appreciate that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is a fair way to treat long-staple cotton, to compel it to make this fight single handed and alone. We ought to give it what support we can, and therefore it ought not to be permitted to die in isolation and without assistance from those who are in like condition. I wish the Senator from Utah would put in wool.

Mr. SMOOT. I reserve the right to put it in if the amendment of the Senator from Arizona is agreed to. If the Senate adopts the principle of it, then I want, of course, to offer my amendment; but I think it is fair to the Senator from Arizona to comply with his request.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I simply request a separate vote on my amendment. I appreciate the humorous efforts of my distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He does not seem to treat it with the seriousness he displays when advocating other matters. When it comes to the question of bringing men to ruin by reason of the action of the Government itself he treats it humorously. And this is not a prospective ruin, it is a present ruin. If anything bad happens to wool I shall regret it as much as any Senator on the floor. If anything bad should happen to many industries of the country I should regret it as much as any Senator on the floor. I am only asking for that article which relates to my part of the country. I am pleading for those who have been induced to go into bankruptcy, pledging their money on the hope of selling their cotton, investing it in bonds, and they stand to-day under the hammer of the sheriff if we do not prevent the importation of English cotton here, with the heartlessness of the cotton manufacturers using this English importation as a means of breaking them and at the same time England prohibiting the importation of American shoes.

I hope the Senate will give me a vote on the amendment separately, and I sincerely contend that for those whose hopes stand in the balance now it is a question of salvation from absolute ruin. I should like the sense of the Senate on the necessity of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, may I inquire from the Senator who offered the amendment whether he will accept this amendment to the amendment:

Nor shall any Indian corn be imported into the United States during that period.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is that suggestion made in humor or in earnest?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I am in earnest.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never jest in this body.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator makes some very humorous suggestions sometimes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble is with the interpretation the audience puts upon the suggestions. I am a little ahead of the procession sometimes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thought we were the greatest exporters of corn in the world. I speak to the Senator in all seriousness. In view of the immediate effect of the amendment, in which I am deeply interested, I ask him as a favor to me to let us have a vote on the amendment independently. Then if the Senator thinks his amendment is of sufficient importance he can offer it.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not yielded the floor, but I will yield to my colleague if he desires.

Mr. LEWIS. No, Mr. President, I rose to address the Senate upon the bill for a moment or two. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. I prefer to yield to the request of the Senator from Arizona for a vote before I take the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope we will have a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This bill is of such very great importance that I shall ask the Senate to remain in session this evening until a vote is had upon it if Senators will stay and help it through.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall not take much time, I will say to the Senator from Oregon. I am in dead earnest about my amendment, notwithstanding what my friend from Arizona may think.

Corn is now coming through the Atlantic coast ports from Argentina. Those imports have broken the price of corn. Farmers in the northern Mississippi Valley have loaded up, under the request of the Government, on both stock hogs and hogs now almost ready to go into the market, into which are fed high-priced corn. The farmer last year put out a large acreage of corn. A good deal of his surplus corn is in the crib yet, especially in the case of the farmer who is raising a large quantity of it. About the time he begins to think of marketing his hogs the price is broken upon all the primary markets of the country because of the Argentine importation. I think it would be fair to stop some of the other agricultural importations in order to protect him and make it rather a symmetrical system all around.

No doubt I will surprise the Senator from Arizona by saying to him that I am going to vote for his amendment. I believe in the particular application but not in quite so intense a form. In the summer of 1913, if you will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I proposed on the tariff bill then pending to protect the long-fiber cotton of the United States and said it ought to be done. Since the English engineers built the dam at the second cataract in the Nile they have doubled the entire arable tract of the Nile Valley. There was only a limited area there from the time of the Pharaohs down to the present, because it was natural irrigation. This artificial addition to the cotton land has doubled the area, and not all but the greater part of the long-fiber cotton, outside of the areas named by the Senator from Georgia, come from this one competitive district. England is merely a port of transshipment.

Long-fiber cotton, as every one in the cotton trade or every cotton spinner knows, is used in the higher forms of cotton manufacture. Laces and the higher forms of ladies' lingerie of all kinds, requiring a particular form of cotton, draw on this supply. The importation of 90,000 bales, at an average of 750 pounds to a bale, is a very serious blow to the long-fiber cotton industries of this country.

I said in the summer of 1913 that I believe in protecting this form of cotton. As to the short fiber, the upland cotton, you can compete with the world; you fear nothing from any competitor; but on this particular kind of cotton I believe in the principle. It was rejected at that time, but merely because it was unseasonable. I have not changed my adherence to the principle.

I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona, particularly. The protection is a little high. Absolute prohibition is not quite my idea of a tariff schedule. But it is temporary, and I hope by an application of the intensive form of a remedy a more diluted form will permeate the earth and will afterwards percolate its way into the majority in this Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] insert:

That the importation of Egyptian long-staple cotton into the United States is hereby prohibited for the term of six months from the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as there is to be a yea-and-nay vote upon this amendment I wish to say a word before the vote is taken. I did not intend to speak upon the bill because I realize how vastly important its early passage is.

The purpose of the bill is to meet a great emergency, arising from the sudden termination of hostilities and of contracts for munitions and other supplies needed for the proper prosecution of the war. That emergency is a great one. It affects thousands of contracts and hundreds of millions of dollars. The Committee on Military Affairs held hearings and received a great deal of information from different parts of the country as to the character of these contracts and the imminence of the necessity for taking some care of them. Among other things we were informed that unless this measure or some similar one should be enacted into law by or before the 1st day of February a great many institutions would have to shut down, resulting in throwing to idleness literally hundreds of thousands of employees, particularly in great manufacturing centers like Cleveland, Detroit, Pittsburgh, and similar places throughout the country on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. President, this bill should not be encumbered, however great the necessity, however meritorious the condition, with so many of these extraneous matters. They not only take up an immense amount of time for their consideration but in the event they become component parts of the bill they will make the administration of the bill so much more cumbrous and dilatory.

Moreover, Mr. President, I do not believe in converting a bill of this kind into a protective-tariff measure. I conceive that there is abundant ground for the Government taking care of certain producers in the country who not only at the invitation but almost at the command of the Government invested a great deal of money in the effort to produce and for the purpose of producing things which before the war we obtained from other countries and which are not at present available but absolutely indispensable.

They ought to be taken care of, but to load this bill down with all these subjects is going to postpone its enactment. It is going to make its administration extremely difficult. The very emergency which we are now seeking to avoid will be upon us before we know it unless we forget these other matters and devote ourselves to the enactment of the bill practically as it was reported from the committee.

So, Mr. President, I hope that these conditions will be borne in mind when the vote is taken upon the pending and similar amendments. I do not know what the condition of long-staple cotton is, nor the condition of wools, nor the condition of some other commodities which may need and probably do need the immediate attention of Congress, but let us take those things in their order. Let us get rid of this exigency as soon as possible and then proceed with the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio, and not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. NELSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, but I transfer it to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. STERLING. I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I understand he has not voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Trammell
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Sherman
Fletcher	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg the Senate to indulge me for, I trust, not any length of time, to express the hope that this measure may receive immediate and earnest consideration from the Senate. Let me not mask the fact that the constituency of my eminent colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] and myself, representing the State of Illinois, and particularly the city of Chicago, is largely interested in what would be the outcome of this measure, and naturally I am interested in seeing it pass, but, Mr. President, I am interested to see it pass for another reason.

It has been shown by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], in an observation here a moment past, that there is a threat that thousands of men, indeed hundreds of thousands, would likely be thrown out of employment if this measure should fail to remedy wrongs which those who are interested feel that it will remedy.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I said not a "threat," but an "apprehension."

Mr. LEWIS. I accept the substitute, that there is a fear, an apprehension, that such will be the result. For that reason, Mr. President, I naturally agree with the Senator that we should take any steps that could avoid it.

But, Mr. President, at this particular juncture, if the chairman of the committee will allow me a moment to refer to a subject cogent with this measure, it is this: I wish to deprecate the tendency which we gather here and there from expressions from the Senate as well as from other parts of the country that we are on the eve of some great industrial depression. I wish to oppose my view against that alarm. I wish to stand against Congress converting itself into the "Reds" against industry.

Mr. President, this measure has been made necessary because it seeks to remedy a wrong. It is not being brought forward merely to give employment to men. It is brought forward to prevent losses. There has been a general cry going out from different quarters of the country that we are likely to have a great industrial depression. You are frightening the toilers of the country into the belief that they are to be hungry; there are those who circulate, in their sincerity, the impression that there are to be bread lines. The eminent secretary of the Federation of Labor, a kindly hearted, sincere-souled gentleman, made such a statement before committees of Congress. It was flashed all over the world. You have struck terror by these statements into the minds of millions of toilers of this land, and created the belief that they are soon to be out of employment and walk the streets. They can not see ahead of them the developments of to-morrow. They simply stand affrighted and riven to the spot in the terror of a threatened hunger.

We have made the business man feel that there is bankruptcy that impends over him like a cloud. We have caused the commercial and the industrial man to feel that, for reasons of our own, from some knowledge we have of our international policy or of some domestic course we are about to take, we are conscious that he is to be driven into a distress of commercial depression that may mean his whole business loss.

Mr. President, nothing has been afflicted upon public life that is so startling, so wrong, and so unjustified as are these declarations. I invoke the eminent Members of this body to reflection, and it is to the thought that in the next 10 years this land of ours will have the greatest prosperity in all forms of industry and pursuit that it has ever enjoyed in any decade of its history. Why? Because, if Senators will reflect, and those who have sent out these alarms of danger will but contemplate a moment, here is central Europe like a burned habitation; it still smolders in its ruins, and it has got to be supplied. We are the richest Nation in the world. We are the only people with the money, the only people so situated by our opportunities as to be able to supply them. We have the resources of men; we have the money; we have the toilers; and, Mr. President, we have the genius.

Mr. President, not only will we supply central Europe but Britain and France will likewise be dependent upon us.

You need only move a step further yonder in the Orient, and by the newly knitted relations between Japan and China the doors of a more liberal trade will be now open to us, which before has been denied. That land, also, these manufacturers will supply, giving great demands for new toil. Sir, millions of men will be called into action. Sir, there is South America. Let the thoughtful man feel and reflect that heretofore Germany has had that trade, and that now, because of our contiguity and our relation to those countries, this trade must come to the United States.

Mr. President, it must be plain, therefore, that we are to be the supply house of the earth. Here in our own land I make bold to speak of what is a clear policy of our own just ahead. With the Government taking charge of the railroads, if it shall continue that policy, millions and millions of dollars' worth of new construction must be had; new improvements must be undertaken; millions of men upon railroad development alone must be called. As to the telegraph and the telephone, the same thing is to be repeated.

Mr. President, it is evident that in mechanics, in science, in shipbuilding, particularly, there will be still more hundreds of thousands to be engaged and employed.

Then, sir, let us reflect, let us contemplate, and let us cease this cry of distress. Let there be no more proclaiming of havoc to our country when it must be apparent to all that in supplying all of these demands we will be the country to which all having these desires must take their resort and refuge.

Sir, with the passage of the bill that repairs the wrongs to these manufacturers, coupled with the things that will transpire in the immediate future, let our people be patient and remember that all we are doing is transferring the world from a war status to a peace status; from war industries over to peace industries. In the meantime there is a little confusion; in the meantime there may here and there some distress. There are, of course, complications, but that there is any impending commercial disaster upon our country for the days to come none but a thoughtless man will assert, and that we are to have the greatest era of prosperity and success for our country, for our workingmen, our toilers, our business men, and our captains of industry, so called, every reflecting man must concede.

Therefore, Mr. President, for the passage of this measure I invoke the Senate that we cease sounding alarms and call the attention of our country to the truth around us; that the present policies of this Government promise a prosperity in the next decade unequaled in any of the past. What we should do before the country and the world is to invite them to the truth and to proclaim "all is well."

I trust the measure may have a speedy passage.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question? I intended to do so before he concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I am greatly interested in what the Senator from Illinois has said and I am in accord with his idea that we are to see the greatest prosperity in this country that perhaps we have ever experienced. We have the historic assurance of such fact in the events in our country after the Civil War. But I wish to get the Senator's viewpoint. That prosperity is to come, undoubtedly, in the course of several months or possibly a year; at any rate it is not far away. Now, does the Senator mean that during this transition period we must have nothing to say, nothing to do, and nothing to propose here about the question of unemployment? I have been concerned about that, perhaps needlessly. We have had hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor. The Assistant Secretary of Labor this morning and statisticians from the Labor Department appeared before us, showing that whereas on December 10—I think the report was of that date—there were about 10,000 unemployed men in the country, a week ago to-day there were 212,000, and the reports for to-day, not all in, show that there will be more this week.

We will have to pass through the transition period; men will be out of employment; and I have thought Congress ought to do something in the way of a commission of public works, which I have proposed, to carry on the delayed public works in this country, the Government in cooperation with the States, in communities where there is a labor surplus, and purely as a remedy, you might say an insurance policy, against unemployment. Does the Senator feel that in urging those things we are disturbing the conditions in the country?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded his inquiry, let me make my position clear to him. In the first place, I quite approve of the continuance of public works, particularly when necessary for the public benefit. What I was seeking to explain and what I am very anxious to have the Senate quite appreciate is that however much during the transition period there may be necessity to provide for the temporary distress to which I have alluded we should have it understood that it is but a temporary stage; that Congress does not believe that such will be the general condition for the indefinite future, but that it only arises because this period of transition in transferring from the mechanisms necessary for war to those which will be necessary for peace uses. In the meantime I accept anything that can legitimately be undertaken to continue workmen in employment; but I would that the suggestions were given to us so soon as possible by men such as the able Senator from Iowa now addressing me, who must know, being familiar with the history of his country, that these conditions are but temporary and that the immediate future is filled with the promise of complete prosperity to the toiler, the business man, and the country at large. I am only anxious that we shall not by making these provisions for temporary necessities leave the impression that anyone here is suffering from the fear or indulging the terror that bankruptcy, or distress, or general devastation is to be visited upon our country.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not think anyone indulges in that, but I do think there is need of action along the lines I have indicated to meet the temporary situation until we come to the era of prosperity.

Mr. LEWIS. I assume, if I may be pardoned—and then I will yield the floor—that the Senator caught my observation, that should the Government continue the policy which I have advocated of taking control of the railroads, the telegraph and telephone lines, and the building of ships, in these there should be extension and enlargement of the undertakings that would give employment to all idle workmen.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is not a gracious position to interpose comment adverse to the picture which has been held before the Senate by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; yet I am in very considerable doubt about the correctness of his view. I am not going to take the time now to discuss the question in any great detail, because I hope this bill may be considered and passed this afternoon; but I want to call his attention to the fact that the situation in this country and in the world now is quite different from what it was after the Civil War. A comparison of the two periods can not be easily made. For four years previous to the Civil War we had had unusual depression in the United States; we had been going through a panic. We were just recovering from that condition and the business of the country was ready to go ahead when the Civil War came on. Then we were a developing country short of labor, and there was every incentive for good times for a period after the war. Conditions to-day are quite different, in my opinion, and unless business men take cognizance of world conditions to-day and prepare to meet them they are living in a fool's paradise, and I do not think it is wise to induce anyone to conduct his business under those conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the committee bill has now been perfected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand that there are any other amendments to be offered except the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there are no amendments pending.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my amendment is in the nature of an amendment to the House bill; and after it is adopted, if it shall be adopted, a vote will then come as between the committee substitute for the House bill and my substitute for the House bill. I have therefore waited until the Senate committee substitute could be fully perfected. I shall therefore ask, Mr. President, for the reading of my proposed substitute, for I think it has not been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, page 1, after the word "That," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 24, on page 3, and insert:

Where during the present war and prior to November 12, 1918, officers or agents acting under authority of the Secretary of War have placed orders or made contracts with manufacturers or contractors for war supplies or materials, or for the performance of work thereon, or for the construction or enlargement of plants or other preparation necessary to furnish supplies or materials for the War Department, the procurement of which has heretofore been authorized by Congress, and any of said orders or contracts has been partly or wholly performed, or expense has been incurred by the manufacturer or contractor prior to the 12th day of November, 1918, in preparation or partial execution of said contract or order, the fact that any such contract or order or agreement has not been made in the form or signed in the manner required by law shall not invalidate the same if it was entered into in good faith and lacked only the sanction of a contract in legal form. Nothing herein provided, however, shall be held to validate any contract, order, or agreement given or made by an officer or agent of the War Department not legally qualified or authorized to give a formal legal contract, except where such officer has acted as the representative of a superior officer authorized to make such contract, nor to permit an officer to make such contract with any company, corporation, or firm in which he has, or had at the time, directly or indirectly, any interest.

SEC. 2. That in all cases as above included it shall be lawful to make payments under the terms of the contracts or orders so made or given to the extent that performance thereof has been made, expenditures incurred, or supplies thereunder have heretofore been received and accepted by the United States, provided that payment in such cases shall not exceed the fair value of the supplies or materials delivered to and accepted by the United States, together with remuneration for expenditure properly incurred in preparing to perform said contract, orders, or agreements.

SEC. 3. That in case of the cancellation, suspension, or annulment of any contract, order, or agreement as described in this act by the Secretary of War, or officers or agents acting by his authority, and in cases where no property or supplies have been delivered to and accepted by the United States, or where only partial delivery and acceptance has been made, contractors shall file with the Secretary of War within 60 days after the passage of this act any claim for remuneration arising out of the discontinuance, cancellation, or suspension of such contract, agreement, or order, properly itemized and set forth. Each claim shall thereupon, or as soon as possible, be transmitted to and filed with the commission hereinafter provided for, together with a statement attached thereto showing the amount, if any, which the War Department deems to be justly due to said claimant. If the claimant shall file a statement offering to accept the amount awarded by the War Department in full for said claim, the commission shall, within 10 days, order the same paid in the absence of evidence that it is excessive.

SEC. 4. That for the adjustment of all claims arising out of the cancellation of contracts, orders, and agreements for supplies or materials of war, as described in the foregoing paragraphs of this act, there is hereby created an adjustment commission to be composed of three members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, one representing the War Department, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the business interests of the country, none of whom shall be interested in any contracts with the Government or have an interest in any firm or corporation having war contracts, who shall hold their offices for one year and receive as compensation a salary of $10,000 each. It shall be the duty of said commission promptly to examine and pass upon all claims for compensation and reimbursement arising out of cases as set forth in this act for supplies furnished, expenditures or obligations necessarily incurred, or materials purchased under faith of contracts in legal form or orders received from officers and agents of the Secretary of War as heretofore set forth.

SEC. 5. That in each case, as soon as the commission has made an award, the contractor shall be entitled to receive the same upon giving receipt in full of all demands against the United States arising out of the transaction, or if the contractor is not satisfied with the amount so awarded he shall be entitled to receive, and shall receive at once, 75 per cent of the amount that has been awarded him and he shall thereupon be entitled to appeal the case to the Court of Claims which is hereby given jurisdiction to hear the case and render final judgment in such sum as may be required to reimburse the contractor for supplies and materials delivered to and accepted by the United States and expenditure necessarily incurred in good faith in the partial performance of the contract or order above referred to, or in preparing for the same.

SEC. 6. That in no case, however, shall any award either by the commission or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States, and a remuneration for expenditures necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

SEC. 7. That the purpose of this act being to secure prompt settlement of claims, the commission is authorized to make its own rules and regulations and to hear and determine the issues informally and promptly upon presentation of the case. The commission is authorized to appoint, under such rules and regulations as it shall prescribe, one or more regional boards of examiners to serve in such districts throughout the country as the commission shall fix and determine, to investigate and determine the facts concerning claims, legal or equitable, that may be presented as herein prescribed. The members of such board shall be composed of one representative of the War Department, one representative of the Department of Justice, and one from the business interests of the region, none of whom shall have any interest in the contract, directly or indirectly, and receive no compensation, save and except such per diem compensation as shall be fixed by the commission. Whenever the commission shall refer to any such regional board of examiners any claim, they shall proceed informally to hear the parties, take the proofs, and return the same promptly to the commission with their recommendation thereon.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the reasonable expenses of said commission, to be paid out upon the warrant of the chairman, who shall be chosen by the commission from among their own members, and approved by the secretary, who may be selected by the commission, and who shall receive a salary of not exceeding $5,000 for the period of one year, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be determined by the commission.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there is a very radical difference between the bill as reported now from the Committee on Military Affairs and the bill which I introduced and which the committee unanimously reported several weeks ago. There is also a very decided difference between these two bills and the bill which has come over from the House of Representatives. All of these bills assume to do the same thing, but they do not as a matter of fact do it, and what is attempted in each case is attempted in an entirely different way.

The bill which I introduced purports to validate about 7,000 defective contracts, and it relates in its provisions to none but defective contracts. These contracts aggregate in their possibility something in the neighborhood of two thousand million dollars—an amount of money large enough, it seems to me, to cause the Congress to provide for the adjudication of the amounts due with care and caution.

The bill which has been before the Senate, and which is now fathered by the committee, does the most unheard-of thing of making the War Department, which entered into these illegal contracts—some of them in direct violation of law, and some of them, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has intimated, probably made by officers having interests in the concerns with which they contracted—the tribunal to decide what is due under these contracts. Now, if that were a proposal to make the Secretary of War the judge, I, for one, would be willing to accept it, or to accept the decisions of any other responsible man or men. But to say that an executive department, composed of thousands of employees and hundreds of officers shall be a tribunal to pass upon contracts that it has made strikes me as something which the country will not consider safe, and which is certainly most extraordinary.

The bill which I have introduced, and which the committee at first reported, first provides for the validation of all these contracts or informal orders made in good faith upon which the contractor has proceeded to the expenditure of money or to the delivery of supplies. Those are all to be validated if they were made in good faith, however irregular, and if the contractor has proceeded on that good faith to carry out his side of it.

The second provision sets forth the rules of payment. The contractor shall be paid for all that he has delivered to the Government, and he shall be remunerated for all materials purchased and obligations incurred, and for all expenditures undertaken in the performance of the contract which the War Department has canceled.

The third provision provides for the cancellation of the contracts, and provides that within 30 days after the passage of the bill contractors shall file their claims with the War Department, and that thereupon the War Department shall examine them with the machinery that it has, and shall attach to each claim a statement of what the department feels is due. Then the claim, with the attached statement, is to be filed with the commission which this bill creates—a commission of three men appointed by the President, one representing the War Department, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the business interests of the country. If the contractor files with the commission at the same time or subsequently an offer to accept the award which the War Department has made, the amount of money shall be paid to him within 10 days, unless evidence has meanwhile come to the commission that the claim is excessive. That makes this commission of three men responsible, with the aid of the War Department, for any award made. It puts the War Department in a position where none of its officers will be able to render an award for an excessive amount, because what they say is merely a recommendation, and must have the sanction of the commission before the contractor becomes entitled to it. If the contractor refuses to accept the amount, however, the commission shall hear both sides; and if the department already has its evidence ready, and the contractor will have his evidence ready, it is a very simple matter for three business men informally, as the bill provides, to decide what is right, or reasonably so; and when the decision is reached, if the contractor chooses to accept it, he gets his money at once. If he wants to appeal to the Court of Claims, he shall be paid 75 per cent of what has been awarded him, and then the Court of Claims will merely pass upon the disputed part.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. This presents the real crux of this legislation, and there is practically no one in the Chamber except those who are committed to the other side of the controversy. I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum. I do not do it for the purpose of delay, but I see nothing to be gained by a discussion when there is practically no one here to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield for that purpose?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Thomas
Borah	Kellogg	Poindexter	Townsend
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pollock	Trammell
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fletcher	La Follette	Robinson	Walsh
France	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Gay	McKellar	Shafroth	Weeks
Gerry	McNary	Sheppard	Williams
Hardwick	Martin, Ky.	Sherman	Wolcott
Henderson	Moses	Smith, Ariz.
Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Spencer

Mr. McKELLAR. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my bill provides that within 30 days after its passage the contractors shall file all their claims with the department; that the department shall use its machinery to make up a statement as to what is due on each claim, and send each claim to the commission; that if the contractor is willing to accept it, within 10 days the money shall be paid him, unless evidence develops that it is excessive; that if he is not willing to accept it, the commission shall promptly hear the case. If he accepts the award by the commission, it shall be paid him. If he declines to accept it, he shall be entitled to 75 per cent and take the balance to the Court of Claims. My bill also provides, however, that no future profits or possible or prospective profits shall be taken into account; that the contractor shall receive simply profits upon what he has delivered to the Government, or remuneration for expenditures which he has incurred in getting ready to perform the contract. In other words, he is to be made good for any expenditures, and have a profit on everything he has delivered.

I have referred to the other bill. The other bill makes the War Department the judge, the tribunal, to try these cases, involving two thousand million dollars and 6,000 contracts. The War Department, which made the contracts, is to be empowered under the present committee bill to try them and to decide on the right and the wrong—not any one man or any three men in the War Department, but possibly 150 or 200 officers, some passing upon one, some passing upon another, and nobody responsible for the result.

I am not disposed to criticize the War Department. I think the War Department, as at present organized, is immensely improved over what it has been; but I do say that the people of the United States who have the taxes to pay will resent the idea of intrusting to this department, composed as it is of so many different branches and officers, the performance of acts which must necessarily be judicial acts in deciding what is due on a contract.

That is not all. This bill contains carte blanche authority to the Secretary of War to validate contracts, even when the contractor has not spent a cent nor delivered a single dollar's worth of goods. In other words, if he has made a contract for $10,000,000 worth of goods with a contractor, under the first paragraph of section 1 the Secretary of War is authorized to validate that contract, which may be illegal or defective, and carry out the contract, or settle it in any way he pleases.

Is that a proper power for Congress to intrust to the Secretary of War, or anybody else, in dealing with a contractor who has merely received a contract, who has not spent a dollar under it, who has not delivered a dollar's worth of goods under it? Why, it might be a contract entered into only the day before the armistice; and yet in that first paragraph the Secretary of War is given carte blanche authority to validate it, and go on with it as he pleases. Now, I do not think any contract defective in form should be validated unless the contractor has incurred obligations or has spent money on it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Under this authority of which the Senator speaks, could the Secretary of War validate and go ahead and carry out these contracts which we have had up heretofore incidentally with reference to purchasing cantonment sites, and so forth?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As the bill was first drawn that authority existed. I am inclined to think it has been eliminated, as far as real estate is concerned; but there is practically no limit to the power of the Secretary of War to validate a contract, even when the contractor has not turned a wheel or done a thing toward carrying it out.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator if the last three lines on page 4 of the reprint of the Chamberlain bill do not obviate that criticism?—

> That such waiver shall not validate such contract or procurement order in so far as any claim for unearned profits may be involved.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not think they do; and that particular provision is entirely contradictory of a provision later ingrafted into the bill, which provides that profits on the unearned part of the contract may be taken into account. For instance, it says:

> That in no case shall any award either by the Secretary of War, the commission, or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States and a remuneration, which may include a reasonable profit for expenditures and obligations or liabilities necessarily incurred in performing or preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

That is directly contradictory to the provisions of section 1, and I do not know how they would be construed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the provision last read by the Senator applies to contracts which are partially performed, and only those.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under one construction of the provision that is so; but I think there is some question about his right even then. In fact, there are now so many contradictions that have crept into the bill that it is not consistent with itself. It was, to my mind, a rather preposterous document the way it was drawn—to create an executive branch of the Government into a tribunal and allow it to award claims of two thousand million dollars by men who are not known to the country, and by a department in which the responsibility for any act is not fixed.

It has been claimed that the advantage of this particular bill is that it would hurry the settlement of these claims. I deny that. The very machinery in the War Department which is depended upon to act as a judicial machinery can and will be used by the department to decide what in its opinion should be paid. If that decision is reached and the contractor accepts it and nothing comes before the commission within 10 days to indicate that it is excessive, the commission will order the payment and be responsible for the payment; and the country will know that this commission, composed of three men named by the President and confirmed by the Senate, has ordered the payment.

But that is not all of the very extraordinary provisions of the committee bill.

After creating the War Department into a tribunal to hear and try and pass upon and render a decision on its own contracts, to which it was a party, this extraordinary bill provides that the Department of Justice, another executive branch of the Government, may appeal to the commission from the decision of the War Department—a most contradictory and preposterous situation, having one executive branch of the Government step in and censor another branch of the Government and appeal from it. It will compel the Department of Justice to examine all of the contracts made by the War Department, if it performs its duty to the public.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator what is the shortest time, under his bill, within which claims may be paid?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The shortest time under my bill might be 15 days. A contractor is permitted to file his claim with the War Department within 30 days after this bill passes. The War Department says it has machinery to say what is due on it. It says it can act quickly. If it can, it can attach to that claim a statement of what it says is due, and file it with the commission. If the contractor accepts it, it can be paid within 10 days. If the contractor objects to it, then it will be heard by the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has this commission an indefinite life?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; one year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It could not be continued, then, like the old Spanish War Claims Commission, for a number of years?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not with my consent. I believe that a commission of men giving their whole time to the matter can pass upon all the controverted questions. I believe that a very large percentage of the decisions reached by the War Department, when they say "So much is due on this contract," will be accepted by the contractors, and they will be ordered paid by the commission within 10 days; and if the contractor is not willing to accept that amount he can take 75 per cent of it and appeal the rest.

To my mind, it is a very important matter that these cases should be heard quickly; it is a very important matter that whatever is due these contractors should be paid to them soon; but it is also a very important matter that the Congress of the United States should avoid giving an executive department of the Government, composed of so many officers whose names are not known to the public, carte blanche authority to settle these contracts and compound them.

My bill deals only with the six or seven thousand contracts that are invalid now. It deals only with the contracts that the Secretary of War cancels. It gives money to the contractor only when he has expended money upon the good faith of the contract which he has made. But this committee bill, as it is proposed here, authorizes the Secretary of War to validate any contract in writing, however defective, even if the contractor has not expended a dollar under it or delivered a dollar's worth of goods to the Government; and I say that is giving too much power to any executive officer. Of course, too, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] says, the worst part of it is that we do not intrust it to the Secretary of War. There are so many of these cases that when we say "the Secretary of War" we mean perhaps 20, 30, 40, or 50 different officers under him, to each one of whom these matters may be assigned. It is an irresponsible way of reaching decisions, in a manner which is just going to open the door to all sorts of fraud and favoritism.

Naturally this department, with all these various officers, has its favorites, its prejudices, and its friendships. I do not think it is right for these unnamed individuals to be given in this bill carte blanche authority to act as judges in cases on which they have already passed.

The committee could not very well avoid the commission idea which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and I have introduced into the bill, but they make it a commission of appeals, and make the difficulties of appeal so great that there is no protection for the public. There is no appeal unless the Department of Justice steps into the War Department and makes an appeal. A real affront has got to be perpetrated by the Department of Justice against the War Department in order to protect the public where an appeal is necessary.

There is only one way, in my opinion, Mr. President, for this legislation to be done safely, and that is to do as we did after the Civil War, create a responsible commission to hear these cases, to give to the War Department full machinery to decide cases quickly, to provide for the earliest possible payment to the individual, and if he is not satisfied with all of it give him 75 per cent of what the commission awards and let him appeal on the balance.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. MCKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. I think he rose first.

Mr. LENROOT. I am informed that during my absence from the Chamber the Senator argued that the amendment adopted yesterday at my instance, excepting from the validation of contracts any unearned profits, was inconsistent with the McKellar amendment, which permitted a reasonable profit upon expenditures and obligations actually incurred. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It struck me as inconsistent, although it might be construed as applying only to this particular paragraph.

Mr. LENROOT. It does; but even applied to that paragraph it is not at all inconsistent, because where the expenditures are made profits may be earned and would be earned; and in allowing under the McKellar amendment a reasonable profit, it is an earned profit we are allowing and not an unearned one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not an important matter.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I suppose it is in order now to perfect the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I will ask the Senator to take the print of the committee bill as amended and turn to page 11. I desire to offer section 3 of the committee bill as amendment No. 1, to come in its regular order, section 4 of the committee bill to come in its regular order, and section 5, on page 14 of the committee bill, to come in its regular order, as amendments to the bill; then, on page 3, the proviso at the bottom of the page, being a part of the House bill as amended by the Senate this morning. I offer those four as amendments to the Senator's bill, and I hope he will accept them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that the amendments to which the Senator from Tennessee refers are all amendments that have been put in upon the floor of the Senate as safeguards to the committee bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am willing to accept them.

The SECRETARY. Insert section 3 as amended in Committee of the Whole, all of section 4, and all of section 5, with the proviso added at the end:

Provided further, That the names of such contractors—

And so forth.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That is right. The amendments have been accepted. Let the Chair put the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nebraska accepts the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee as parts of his amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I also ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will accept the amendment I offered, which was also adopted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Nevada which he offered and which was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The subcontractor's amendment was not put in. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio, if he desires to put it in.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly do.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think it ought to go in.

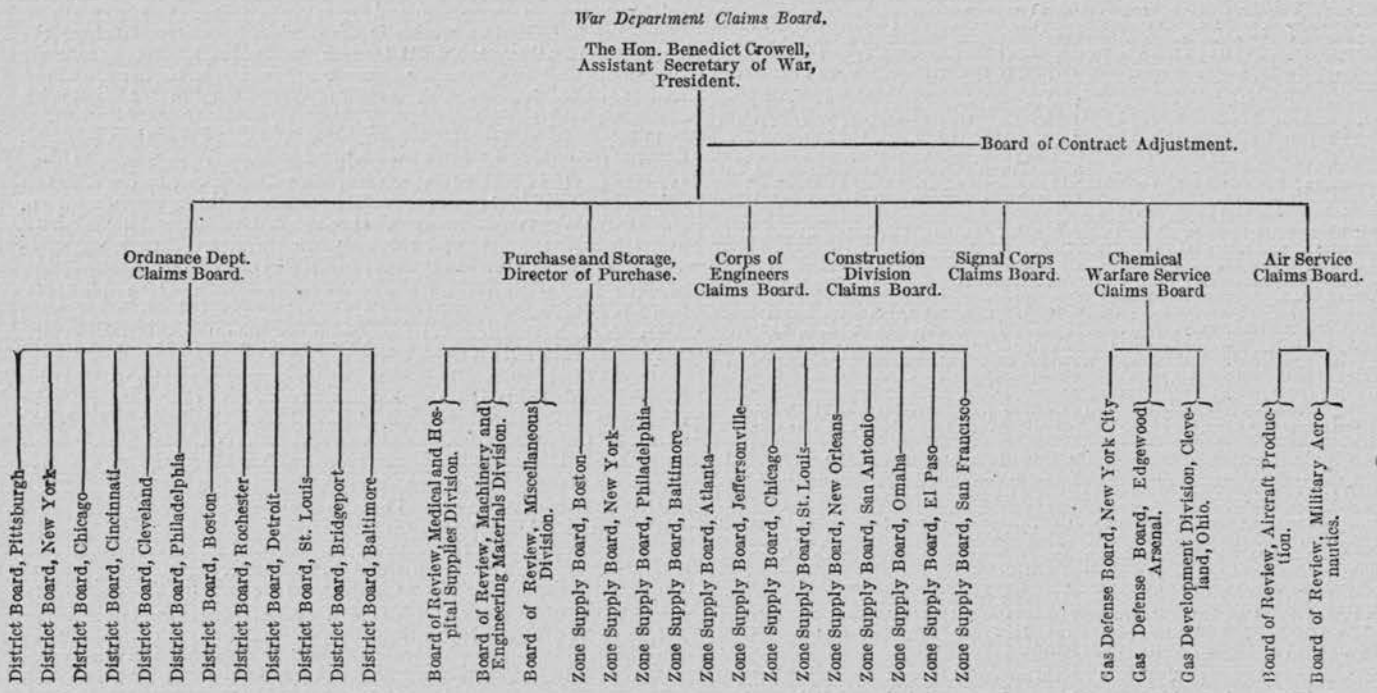
Mr. POMERENE. There were two amendments which I had offered to section 4.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will accept both of those. They have been adopted by the Senate and are properly a part of the bill, just the same as they were of the other bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nebraska has accepted all the amendments referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the acceptance of any of these amendments to the so-called Hitchcock bill, but I think that they ought to be discussed separately before they are accepted, because I question very much if some of them will fit into the terms of the pending Hitchcock amendment. However, if the Senator from Nebraska is willing to accept them as they are I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments suggested will be considered as having been accepted as a part of the original amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.



Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the criticisms which the Senator from Nebraska levels against the bill which has been pending in the Senate for the last two days, that it is a jumble and unintelligible, will more than apply to his proposed amendment with the amendments which have been adopted and which do not fit into the bill which he has before the Senate now.

Mr. President, I have not yet called the attention of the Senate to the tribunal which is to adjust these claims. The Senator from Nebraska makes the sweeping charge that there has been turned over to the War Department, an executive or administrative branch of the Government, the determination of matters which have been illegally done by them, and wherever illegality is found it is due to the inefficient methods of that department.

Mr. President, that is not entirely correct. In order to show exactly the tribunals which adjust these claims and that have been working on them since the 11th day of November I present and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a diagram showing the different tribunals that are adjusting these claims now that are sought to be validated by the pending measure. It takes a vote of the Senate to permit the diagram to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the diagram which he presented shall go into the RECORD as a part of his remarks. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

The diagram referred to is as follows:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact that the Hitchcock bill does not validate any claims. As a part of that diagram and to go in juxtaposition with it I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the list of persons who constitute the several boards and the titles of the boards which are to hear and determine these claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

List of boards supervising and passing upon the adjustment of contracts in the War Department.

WAR DEPARTMENT CLAIMS BOARD.

President, Hon. Benedict Crowell, the Assistant Secretary of War, director of munitions.

Mr. G. H. Door, assistant director of munitions.

Brig. Gen. George W. Burr, assistant to Maj. Gen. Goethals, director of purchase, storage, and traffic.

Brig. Gen. Herbert M. Lord, director of finance, purchase, storage, and traffic division.

Lieut. Col. Herbert H. Lehman, assistant to Maj. Gen. Goethals, director of purchase, storage, and traffic.

Special members: Mr. W. H. Davis, Col. C. A. McKenney, Maj. H. L. Goodhart, Maj. Harry D. Rawson, Capt. Arthur Day.

Recorder: Maj. Erskine Bains.

The function of this board is to supervise and coordinate the work of contract adjustment throughout the department. Through its special representatives sitting with the bureau boards all contract adjustments of the department are subject to its scrutiny and approval, and adjustments involving matters of policy and of particular difficulty and importance are brought before the full board for decision.

BOARD OF CONTRACT ADJUSTMENT.

Lieut. Col. Herbert H. Lehman, assistant to Maj. Gen. Goethals, director of purchase, storage, and traffic.

Lieut. Col. E. F. Malone.

Lieut. Col. C. B. Garnett.

This board passes on the questions of contract adjustment on which the contractor and the local and bureau boards of the department have been unable to reach agreement.

ORDNANCE BUREAU.

Ordnance claims board: Brig. Gen. W. S. Peirce, Col. R. P. Lamont, Col. G. H. Stewart, Col. Earl McFarland, Maj. John R. Delafield.

This board reviews the action of the ordnance district boards.

DISTRICT CLAIMS BOARD.

1. Baltimore—Maj. A. V. Barnes, Capt. R. W. Smith, Maj. L. B. Webster, Capt. F. E. Baldwin, Mr. J. J. Nelligan, Mr. E. G. Baetjer.

2. Bridgeport—Maj. B. A. Franklin, Maj. Frederick Payne, Capt. Miller Brainard, Charles G. Sanford, Edmund C. Wolfe, David H. Day, Charles W. Graham.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The highest tribunal of all is the War Department claims board. The Senator from Nebraska has said if the settlement or the final adjudication of claims had been left to the Secretary of War he would not make any objection to such proceeding. The bill that is pending does that very thing and vests the final adjudication of these claims in the following gentlemen, who constitute the War Department claims board:

Benedict Crowell, the Assistant Secretary of War, Director of Munitions; G. H. Dorr, Assistant Director of Munitions; Brig. Gen. George W. Burr, assistant to Maj. Gen. Goethals, Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic; Brig. Gen. Herbert M. Lord, Director of Finance, Purchase, Storage, and Traffic Division; Lieut. Col. Herbert H. Lehman, assistant to Maj. Gen. Goethals, Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic; and the following special members: W. H. Davis, Col. C. A. McKenney, Maj. H. L. Goodhart, Maj. Harry D. Rawson, Capt. Arthur Day, and Maj. Erskine Bains, recorder of the War Department Claims Board.

The function of this board is to supervise and coordinate the work of contract adjustment throughout the department. Through its special representatives sitting with the bureau boards all contract adjustments are subject to its scrutiny and approval, and adjustments involving matters of policy and of particular difficulty and importance brought before the full board for decision. The War Department has had functioning in the different districts, in the adjustment of these claims, the district board in Pittsburgh, the district board in New York, the district board in Chicago, the district board in Cincinnati, the district board in Cleveland, the district board in Philadelphia, the district board in Boston, the district board in Rochester, the district board in Detroit, the district board in St. Louis, the district board in Bridgeport, and the district board in Baltimore, all of which come under the Ordnance Department claims board.

These district boards adjudicate the claims which are supervised by the Ordnance Department claims board. Before the finding is finally acted on it goes up to the board of contract adjustment, and from them to the War Department proper. The names of the officers and civilians composing all these boards are inserted in the RECORD.

There must be, in the very nature of things, on these several boards that have to do with ordnance, some honest men in the War Department and in the Army and some honest men who are appointed from civil life. So matters or claims in dispute in the Ordnance Department go through all these district boards, and through them to the higher board, and from that board to a still higher board, and from that to the Assistant Secretary of War, to civilians and officers who occupy that final adjustment board.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator's description of the way claims go from one board to another and from one officer to another is exactly like the work he and I have been criticizing—the paper work in the department, red tape by which a thing that is a mere formal matter has gone from one department to another for weeks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is not correct in reference to the position I have heretofore taken.

I call attention to these things to show that if you adopt any other policy than that outlined in the bill pending before the Senate and known as the committee bill you will not within the year, I venture to say, get any of these claims adjusted.

I am going to call attention to one peculiarity in the so-called Hitchcock amendment in this connection in a short while.

Now, taking the director of purchases, there come under him board of review medical and hospital supply division; board of review machinery and engineering, materials division; board of review miscellaneous division; the zone supply board, Boston; the zone supply board, New York; the zone supply board, Philadelphia; and all these other cities where there are regional boards; and the names of those gentlemen are inserted in the RECORD.

Over these several boards that I have just mentioned, covering other things than the Ordnance Department, there is a director of purchase and storage. He is above them and scrutinizes the findings of these different boards. Still above him is the board of contract adjustment and the War Department proper; so that these contracts pass under the scrutiny of all these regional and zone boards and then up through to the War Department. Then, there are still other boards covering other supply departments of the Government where contracts have been let, and the names of these several boards are given and will be published in the RECORD. I invite the attention of the Senate to the names of these men, because they represent the very highest intelligence of the Army and the highest intelligence of civil life in the communities where these several boards are located.

The peculiar thing about the so-called Hitchcock bill is this, Mr. President: It trusts the War Department absolutely up to a certain point. The Senator criticizes leaving these matters to the War Department; yet up to a certain point he trusts absolutely in the functioning of the War Department, and then branches off on an inconsistent proposition of creating a commission to do again what he has practically intrusted the War Department to do up to a certain point.

I call the attention of the Senate to the provision of the Hitchcock bill to which I am now referring. Section 3 of the bill provides:

> Each claim shall thereupon, or as soon as possible, be transmitted to and filed with the commission hereinafter provided for, together with a statement attached thereto showing the amount, if any, which the War Department deems to be justly due to said claimant.

So it allows the War Department to adjust these claims and say how much is due. Now note:

> If the claimant shall file a statement offering to accept the amount awarded by the War Department in full for said claim, the commission shall, within 10 days, order the same paid in the absence of evidence that it is excessive.

Up to that point the measure of the Senator from Nebraska absolutely indorses and approves all that the War Department and its subordinate boards pass upon. Up to that point there is practically little difference between the two bills except that the bill of the Senator from Nebraska does not validate any of these claims which it is sought to validate because of some irregularities in their execution or other irregularities which the act specifically points out. Section 4 of the Senator's bill provides:

SEC. 4. That for the adjustment of all claims arising out of the cancellation of contracts, orders, and agreements for supplies or materials of war, as described in the foregoing paragraphs of this act, there is hereby created an adjustment commission to be composed of three members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, one representing the War Department, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the business interests of the country, none of whom shall be interested in any contracts with the Government or have an interest in any firm or corporation having war contracts, who shall hold their offices for one year and receive as compensation a salary of $10,000 each. It shall be the duty of said commission promptly to examine and pass upon all claims for compensation and reimbursement arising out of cases as set forth in this act for supplies furnished, expenditures or obligations necessarily incurred, or materials purchased under faith of contracts in legal form or orders received from officers and agents of the Secretary of War as heretofore set forth.

In other words, while the bill pretends in one section to adopt the action of the War Department and its subordinate boards, in another provision it practically provides that all these things must be reinvestigated and adjudicated by the commission which the bill proposes to create. So even if the first section of the Senator's bill, approving the action of the War Department, were in force, it is inconsistent with section 4 which requires this board or commission to reinvestigate and report on these claims. In other words, it would require the board created by his bill to reinvestigate all of the claims that have been filed by the commission, and in the very nature of things do over again exactly the thing that the War Department has done through its officers and agents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not mean to say that the commission is compelled to try all of the claims when the contractor and the War Department agree?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It says so in section 4.

It shall be the duty of said commission promptly to examine and pass upon all claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It passes on them, and they are instructed when the War Department and the constructor agree that payments shall be made within 10 days.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am calling attention to the inconsistency of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no inconsistency.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely there is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It passes on each one and orders it to be paid within 10 days.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Taking the bill by the four corners and reading it, it requires this commission to reinvestigate every claim that the officers of the War Department have already adjudicated or adjusted with the party.

Mr. President, the hour is so late that I do not care to go into a further comparison of the two bills. The only serious difference between the two is that the Senator's bill provides for the creation of a commission that shall investigate all these claims, and that commission can not get to functioning before the 1st of July; while the bill which the Senate has practically adopted to-day provides that the War Department, through its agencies, shall adjudicate these claims, and there is the right of appeal to the aggrieved party.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the only sensible and efficient way to adjust these claims is through the agencies that the War Department has created, and which have practically determined these matters now except in some instances where there will be more or less of litigation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator sits down will he not state what is his opinion of the power given in the first paragraph of the bill to the Secretary of War to validate the contracts upon which no money has been expended and the contractor has delivered no goods?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no provision in the bill which authorizes that. There is the provision which authorizes what ought to be authorized. If a man, acting upon the representations of an agent of the War Department or acting upon the authority of the War Department, has given an individual or a firm or a corporation an order and that individual, firm, or corporation has gone to work and made some expenditures but has not delivered a dollar's worth of goods to the Government the contract ought to be validated and the man, firm, or corporation ought to be paid what he or it is reasonably entitled to receive for expenditures made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But this paragraph does not cover such a case.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the bill does in its entirety, does it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; this paragraph proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to validate contracts, although no money has been expended and no property delivered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish the Senator would call my attention to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will read it to the Senator. The language is:

That whenever during the war emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, any individual, firm, company, corporation, or foreign government has made an agreement with the Secretary of War, or with any officer or agent acting under his authority, or with any agency of the Government authorized to procure for the War Department, for the production, manufacture, sale, acquisition, or control of equipment, materials, or supplies, or for services, or for facilities, or other purposes connected with the prosecution of the war, and such agreement was reduced to the form of a contract or accepted procurement order and executed or signed on behalf of the Government, but the agreement did not comply with statutory requirements, in every such case the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to waive, on behalf of the Government, such noncompliance——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But there is a proviso.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It continues:

Provided, That he finds such waiver is not inconsistent with the public interest, and in this event the said agreement shall have the same validity and effect it would have had if such statutory requirement had been complied with.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was an amendment to that, as the Senator from Nebraska will observe, which fully protects the Government in relation to claims of that sort.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It reads:

And provided further, That such waiver shall not validate such contract or procurement order in so far as any claim for unearned profits may be involved.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not a single word in the bill which the Senator has read which validates any claim where nothing whatsoever has been done by a contractor with the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no limitation on whether a contractor has entered upon the contract or not. It gives the Secretary of War absolute authority to validate a contract that is still absolutely in the future and toward which the contractor has done nothing at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I insist that it does not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It takes the power of legislation away from Congress, where it now is, and places it with the Secretary of War. If a man has a contract for a million shells that was made on the last day of the armistice and not a thing had been done about it, the Secretary of War can validate it, and that contract will go into effect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But would the Secretary of War be foolish enough to validate a contract entered into between him or his agents and a party who promised to manufacture a million shells and had done absolutely nothing in the performance of that contract? If he would do such a thing as that, or his agents would do such a thing as that, he or they ought to be impeached or court-martialed; but if a man has made a contract with the Government to manufacture a million shells and has not manufactured a single shell, but in order to perform the contract had done work and put up buildings, he ought to be compensated for his expenditure. There is not any question about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will pardon me, the very language of the bill is "an agreement."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; an agreement, contract, or order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; an agreement. The man who has a contract with the Government must be kept safe upon his agreement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly; there is no doubt about that, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. President, there is nobody who is connected with this Government, there is no officer or agent of the Government, who would for a moment consider a contract that had been entered into between the Government and a contractor when nothing on earth had been done. That is the case the Senator from Nebraska undertakes to put. Even if a contract had been validly entered into, the right of cancellation exists, and a safe and sane Secretary of War or a sane officer of the Army would see to it that such a cancellation was had; but if an expenditure was made for preparation for manufacture and yet no goods delivered under the contract the contractor would be entitled to receive some compensation or remuneration for the expenditures actually made. That is the extent to which this bill goes, but the bill of the Senator from Nebraska does not even validate any contract. It simply says it shall not invalidate them, but it does not validate the contracts.

The remaining paragraph of this bill validates other contracts partially executed or improperly executed. Taking the bill together, it fully protects not only the right of the contractor but the right of the Government; but under the provisions of the bill of the Senator from Nebraska these matters can not be adjusted, I venture to say, inside of six months or a year. In the meantime men will be going out of employment; and not only that, but men who have performed these services for the Government in manufacture, and so forth, will probably go into bankruptcy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just for a moment I want to explain to the Senate the precise difference between these two bills, if I may. The War Department is, of course, responsible for our having to legislate at all. Let us all remember that. It has failed to make proper contracts, and it is for the relief of the contractors that this legislation is proposed. We are to validate that which the War Department has failed to do.

Our committee, when the matter first came up, turned the subject of the validating of contracts over to a subcommittee, which was composed of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and myself. We worked faithfully on the matter. We heard testimony, and we reported what is known as the Hitchcock bill back to the full committee, and the full committee unanimously reported that bill to the Senate. Since that time various gentlemen have felt that there ought to be changes made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, and I will do so. I have something on my mind that I want to tell the Senate, and when I get relieved of that I shall be delighted to yield.

The committee reported unanimously the Hitchcock bill, but the War Department felt that that was taking this matter out of their hands, and a measure was presented which put it entirely back into their hands. However, finding that that could not possibly pass, they then apparently yielded to the demand for a commission, and provided for an appellate commission. That appellate commission is embodied in the Chamberlain bill.

The difference between the two commissions is that if you pass the Hitchcock bill you turn the settlement of all these matters over to a fair and an impartial tribunal. If you vote for the Chamberlain bill you turn about 95 to 99 per cent of the contracts back into the hands of the War Department, whose negligence is the cause of this proposed legislation. It is up to you to say whether you are going to do it or not. If you want to say that the War Department has done its duty in the matter and are willing to stand by the War Department, pass the bill which was last reported by the committee. If you want to see that every one of the contractors gets fair and impartial treatment before a commission to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, not one that has simply appellate jurisdiction—and it is very hard to get that appellate jurisdiction under the terms of the Chamberlain bill, as it is called—if you merely want to turn over a few cases to this commission, with a technical jurisdiction, you should vote for the Chamberlain measure. If you want to turn it all over to a commission to do fair, even, and equal justice as to all these claims, vote for the Hitchcock bill, as I propose to do.

The Senator from Oregon says: "Here is all this machinery in the War Department." They have that machinery in the War Department; all those boards have been in existence for quite a long time in the War Department; but if they do not act with more care in the carrying out of the authority we are proposing to give them now than they have in executing these contracts I am afraid we are engaging in a very poor business in turning the matter over to them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator wants to be fair.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will he permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They have been in existence only since the armistice; and since that time they have practically reached an agreement with nearly all of the contractors.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken. The matter is in the hands of precisely the same men, the same officers, and the same boards as heretofore, with one exception, namely, that since the armistice the Secretary of War has appointed three gentlemen whose names I do not remember—they may be very excellent gentlemen—to constitute an appellate commission. I doubt if there is a Senator here who can remember the names of those three men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say to the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment. The Secretary of War appointed this commission, notwithstanding the order of November 11. If they were appointed before November 11, I do not know, and if they were he, of course, did not violate the order; but if they were appointed since that time they were appointed officers of the Army, and it is a board composed of Army officers appointed especially for the purpose of sitting on these cases. Now, let us see what they do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senate will probably not be able to secure a vote on this bill this afternoon, and I desire Senators to look at the names of the members of the boards organized in any of the communities where any work has been done for the Government of the United States, and they will find that they are the peers of any men in the community, including the board appointed since the 11th of November.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not a word of criticism to make of those men. Whatever they are doing their work will inure to the benefit of the Government and the contractors under the Hitchcock bill as well as under the other bill. The only difference between these two bills, Senators, is that under the Hitchcock bill these contracts, in connection with which the War Department admittedly has not done its duty, will all go to the commission to be created, while under the Chamberlain bill, which is a substitute amendment, only a very small percentage of these contracts will be acted upon by the commission. Contracts which have been made in a topsy-turvy manner by Tom, Dick, or Harry, by some lieutenant or some civilian giving an order—some orders being in writing, some over the telephone, and some by word of mouth—are the contracts we are validating; and if the Senate votes for the Chamberlain bill we are turning them back to the very men who have neglected their duty. Now, let us not make any mistake about what we are doing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said a while ago that the committee had unanimously reported the Hitchcock bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was unanimously reported; yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. All the committee was not present. That is what I wanted to say a few moments ago. The Senator talks about a unanimous report from a committee, when it is only the unanimous report of a quorum.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not responsible for Senators not being present. I recall the fact that the bill was first referred to a subcommittee that took days and weeks to study the matter, gave it the best thought and attention that they knew how to give it, and reported back to the full committee. Following discussion the committee, after making amendments, unanimously reported it to the Senate, so far as the members present were concerned. It was after that bill was published that others came before the committee, I have no doubt with the best intentions, some gentlemen of the finest order of ability, who seemed to be absolutely fair and who were instrumental, I will say, in securing the adoption of some of the very valuable amendments that have been placed in both bills. Those are the facts concerning this measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator how it is that the bill as it was reported to the Senate only includes the so-called Chamberlain amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because the committee met afterwards and by a majority of one, as I recall, voted to substitute the Chamberlain amendment for the Hitchcock amendment previously reported.

Mr. SMOOT. Reported to the Senate or reported to the committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Reported to the Senate.

Mr. KIRBY, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas, who has been standing on the floor for some time?

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised the Senator from Georgia that I would yield to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber when the Senator made his statement regarding the unanimous report of the subcommittee. I was a member of the subcommittee——

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not make that statement, although I supposed the report had the concurrence of the Senator from New Jersey. I said that the bill reported by the subcommittee, known as the Hitchcock bill, was unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Without discussion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, there were several amendments made in the committee, and to that extent it was discussed. I understand that to be a discussion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask whether or not it is the purpose of the Senator from Oregon to force this measure to a vote to-night?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think that can not very well be done. There are quite a number of Senators who are not present.

Mr. BORAH. The debate is getting more interesting all the time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hardly think we can get a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will yield to me further, I wish to state that I was a member of the subcommittee, but I was absent from the city when the bill was considered, and was not informed that it was to be reported. I in no way concurred in reporting the Hitchcock bill, because I am opposed to it. I did assist several committees that came here and pointed out defects in the Hitchcock bill. I stated to the committee that the provisions of that bill would cause unnecessary delay and hardship on the business men of this country who were transacting business with the War Department. It was pointed out that a commission hearing these cases de novo would probably cause a delay of at least a year or a year-and-a-half before the cases could be properly adjudicated. Therefore, I joined with the committee in reframing the bill and reporting the Chamberlain bill, which I believe is the only practical bill, which will be successful in settling these claims promptly, which is the principal problem that we have to deal with at this time.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Since the bill is not to be pressed to a vote this afternoon, I will make an explanation of it in my own time to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I have to say in conclusion, is that, in my judgment, what is known as the Hitchcock bill, as amended, protects the rights of the contractors and the rights of the Government in a fuller and ampler manner than the other bill, and I hope that the Hitchcock bill will be adopted.

I wish to call especial attention to the boards. Senators will see the membership of these boards printed in the RECORD to-morrow. These boards will pass on these claims. Consider how the matter has been handled heretofore. These boards have been in existence all the time. It was their duty to prepare contracts. Congress furnished ample money to pay all the necessary legal expenses, including legal employees, to draw the contracts and agree upon them as they were made; but the department has neglected its duty, and now it comes in and wants us to turn back to it the settlement of the contracts about which it has been negligent. I do not think we ought to do it. I think we ought to put it in the hands of an independent commission, such as is provided for by the bill reported by the subcommittee, and adopted once by the full committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator does not claim that all of these contracts were negligently made or not legally made, does he? Does not this bill apply to a very much larger number, a majority in fact, of transactions where the contracts were legally made and where the department has canceled them because the war ended?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken about that. It applies only to those that have been formally executed, or where there has been no contract at all. I will say to the Senator that it applies to two classes of contracts, or perhaps three. The first is where there is a formal contract that has not been properly signed. The second is where there has just been a written order for the material, and, of course, not signed properly. The third class is verbal contracts; and this undertakes to validate all three. Now, it has been variously estimated that there are all the way from ten to sixty thousand of these kinds of contracts. If there are, if the War Department has so neglected its duty as to leave this vast number of contracts not even properly signed, not even properly given, we had better go very slowly about turning over the settlement of all these contracts to that department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is not the Senator entirely mistaken about those figures?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am just stating what the proof before us has been. There have been various estimates. As I recall, the number has been variously estimated from 10,000 up as high, some witnesses say, as perhaps 60,000. Now, I can not conceive that there are that many; but I am telling you what has been stated before our subcommittee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Assistant Secretary of War stated to me this morning over the telephone that there were 6,000 of these invalid contracts and orders involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many verbal ones?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Six thousand, including the verbal contracts. A large proportion of those contracts—at least 60 per cent, I believe—are formal contracts, but were not signed by the proper statutory officials. Those 6,000 contracts involve $1,766,000,000. There are not 10,000 contracts, there are not 60,000 contracts, but 6,000 contracts that are invalid, according to Assistant Secretary Crowell's statement to me this morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much is involved in the 6,000 contracts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. One billion seven hundred and sixty-six million dollars.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it may be possible that my informants were not correct in their information; and therefore, as the Senator says that he has this information directly from the Assistant Secretary of War, I accept it absolutely. But here we have 6,000 of these contracts, with nearly $2,000,000,000 involved, and no contracts signed for it—nobody there looking after the interests of the Government when these contracts were signed——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And yet we are asked to turn over to this department, whoever it may be, this vast sum in dispute to be settled. How do we know that they are going to do it? What objection can any Senator raise to a fair and impartial commission, with full jurisdiction to do equal and exact justice to all the parties? What objection can be made to such a commission?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because the trial of 6,000 cases before a commission would take more than 6,000 days. It would probably take 6,000 weeks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, quite the contrary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Still, I gave the Senator an answer.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but that is a very far-fetched one, it seems to me, with all due respect. Many of these contracts, according to the proof, have been already examined by the War Department, and they are ready to report. They can be settled just as quickly and just as expeditiously by this committee with full jurisdiction as they can with partial jurisdiction.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator has stated that the officers who compose these boards in the War Department have been negligent about these contracts and about these adjustments. I think the Senator will admit that the War Department has been industriously endeavoring to reach adjustments, and that the lack of authority is what has stopped them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Ah, Mr. President, it had ample authority. There may be reasons sometimes why these officers have not signed the contracts. The law requires these contracts to be signed in a particular way, and it requires an oath that there is no interest in them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in a moment I am going to move for a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon; and I give notice now that when the Senate reassembles I shall endeavor to keep it in session until this bill is disposed of. I want to say, however, in answer to the Senator from Tennessee, that he forgets absolutely and entirely the emergency which caused the War Department to order supplies and matériel without the execution of formal contracts. Cablegrams were coming over here from Gen. Pershing, demanding that certain things be supplied him forthwith; and the War Department, in the very nature of things, did not have time to execute these contracts.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, on the 22d and 23d of this month a very important conference was held in this city, which discussed the question of the American Merchant Marine. It was addressed by several Members of Congress, including two Members of the Senate. I submit the proceedings of that conference, which I desire to have printed as a public document; and I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter presented will be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 30, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, whose goodness never failing, pours out upon us day by day innumerable blessings, accept our heartfelt gratitude, forgive our sins, and help us hour by hour, day by day, willingly, faithfully, efficiently, to fulfill all the duties Thou hast laid upon us. In the spirit of the world's Great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13708. An act providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, German Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2784. An act to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916; and

S. 3384. An act to amend the public-building act, approved March 4, 1913.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11984, to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. SHERLEY. May I inquire of the gentleman how much time he expects to take in connection with this report?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to say how much time.

Mr. MANN. I understand there is to be some opposition to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am anxious to get through with the appropriation bill in order that I may resume the hearings that must be had on a number of other bills. While I do not like to put my personal convenience before the House, yet it being a matter of importance to the House itself, I was hoping that we might go forward with this deficiency bill this morning.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? I will say that I desire that there shall be a separate vote on some amendments. I shall ask for a separate vote on amendment No. 12.

Mr. HOUSTON. There was an understanding that there should be a separate vote on amendment No. 12, and I should think we ought to get through with this within the hour.

Mr. DYER. I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote on that proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. How can there be a yea-and-nay vote on that proposition? You will have to vote the whole report down.

Mr. MANN. There can not be a yea-and-nay vote on that proposition without rejecting the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The only vote that could be had is voting the conference report up or down.

Mr. MANN. There will undoubtedly be some controversy over the conference report.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to tell how much time will be consumed. I do not want to get in the way of appropriation bills, but I think we can get through within the hour.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; in the first place, we will have to have a quorum, and in the next place, you can not get through in any hour, for I have no doubt there will be a roll call, and in the third place, there will be something of debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to yield on this proposition, but after this appropriation bill is through I understand the Agricultural bill is ready to go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain to the gentleman from Tennessee the difference between the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from South Carolina. The gentleman from Kentucky has more of these appropriation bills that are to be wrought out in committee, and the gentleman from South Carolina has no more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to yield my request for the present not to interrupt the progress of the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I would like to come in right after the disposition of that bill.

Mr. FERRIS. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a more serious matter than the sweeping of this conference report aside. On January 21 the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] made a hard and fast agreement to bring back this amendment for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with agreements; the conference report is brought in and has to be considered as a whole.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did agree on amendment No. 12, and entered into an agreement to have a separate vote, and also on another amendment, but the other amendment was agreed to, and there is no occasion for a separate vote on that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his request?

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has not the floor yet.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. The agreement was made on the floor of the House that there should be a separate vote on two amendments. One amendment has been agreed to, and hence that occasion no longer exists. As to the other amendments we did not agree to the Senate amendment, but agreed to it in a modified form in a substitute that I thought might be satisfactory. I came to these gentlemen who wanted a separate vote, and they said they would rather have a separate vote. I am willing to have a separate vote, and I will ask unanimous consent that they have a separate vote on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. How can you do that? The conference report is acted on by the House and the Senate. The House can not provide for a separate vote on any amendment on a conference report. The only way for that to be done is for the House to reject the conference report and then have a separate vote and send it back to conference.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to do that.

Mr. MANN. I think so, too.

Mr. DYER. That was the agreement.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will permit, I understand we can do almost anything by unanimous consent. By unanimous consent we can agree to vote on this proposition, and if it is voted down, then, as a matter of course, that is a rejection of the conference report and takes the bill back to conference.

Mr. MANN. If the House and Senate were assembled together, they might possibly bind both bodies by unanimous consent; but the House can not by unanimous consent change a conference report agreed to by the Senate managers and presented to the Senate as a whole. The House can not change that in any way. The only thing that can be done is to vote down the conference report. If a separate vote is to be had, the only way is to vote down the conference report, and then have a separate vote on this amendment, and then send it to conference again. There is no other way of doing.

Mr. GARNER. If you are going to go back to conference, had you not better do it this morning, so that you will be ready to come back to-morrow with another conference report?

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to do that. This deals with a matter that is very important. Here is a proposition to give to some 4,000,000 soldiers preference in employment in the Government after they come out of the war, and the hard-and-fast promise was made that we might have a separate vote upon it. But the committee have brought in an entirely independent proposition, which I fear does not render any relief at all to the soldiers.

Mr. DYER. And could deprive every one of the soldiers of getting any job.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman from Tennessee and the conferees did not intend to do anything of that kind.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing to take any course that will put the conferees in the attitude of keeping perfect good faith with the House, because that is all we have been trying to do. We have offered a substitute the merits of which we thought would be satisfactory. Now, if the proponents of the proposition involved in the separate vote are not willing to accept it, we are not going to insist on it.

Mr. MANN. In view of the gentleman's statement, I suggest to him that he ask unanimous consent to have the conference report considered and rejected.

Mr. FERRIS. Have this report unanimously rejected. That will give us a chance to ask for another conference, and then you can bring back a different agreement on that one matter and let us have a vote on it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that would come up later possibly, if there is to be a discussion on that separate amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. How are we to get a vote on that proposition in the House?

Mr. FERRIS. Report a disagreement as to Senate amendment numbered 12. I greatly hope Senate amendment numbered 12 can be agreed to just as it is. I hope it will not be changed at all. The soldiers are entitled to this preference. It should be given willingly. It is not too much.

Mr. MANN. If the conference report is rejected, then the Senate amendments are pending before the House, and it is in order to move to concur in the Senate, either directly or with an amendment. Perhaps the gentleman does not want to do that right now, but may when he gets to the consideration of it later.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of peace and harmony I am going to ask that the report may be disagreed to and sent back to conference.

Mr. MANN. I would not do it right now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman not to make that motion at present. After conversation with the various parties in interest the matter may be adjusted.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the conference report for the present.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15140) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

GENERAL EXPENSES.

Pay, miscellaneous: For commissions and interest, transportation of funds, exchange, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the several acts carrying appropriations thereunder for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, $1,648,502.72.

For commissions and interest, transportation of funds, exchange, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $5,000,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the first item is "Pay, miscellaneous," and it represents an actual deficiency incurred during the years 1917 and 1918.

The second item, of $5,000,000, is an estimated deficiency for the current year, based upon this fact, which pertains to many other items in connection with naval matters: The estimates for the Navy as submitted for the fiscal year 1919 were predicated upon a naval strength of 314,000 men, while the average strength of the Navy for this year will be 445,000 men. In point of fact the Navy strength reached a maximum of 490,000 men. Now, the difference between those two figures results in making deficiencies in a number of items in connection with "Pay, miscellaneous," "Pay of the Navy," and other matters which are dependent upon the size of the personnel for the amounts that need to be expended.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, please?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. That is based upon the number of men that we are supposed to have and are likely to have in the service during this fiscal year?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. There will be an average this fiscal year of 445,000 men for the Navy, it is estimated. There has been a peak of four hundred and ninety thousand and odd men in the Navy. The estimates as submitted to the Congress were based on a naval strength of 314,000 men for this year.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the first estimate was for 350,000 men.

Mr. SHERLEY. My information from the hearings is that it was 314,000 men.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think it is any violation of the rules for me to say to the gentleman that the Naval Affairs Committee have already agreed to report a bill to continue the Navy at 225,000 men. I think the gentleman made reference to that yesterday.

Mr. SHERLEY. That relates, of course, to the coming fiscal year.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand, the next fiscal year.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL EMERGENCY FUND.

For the payment of obligations incurred prior to November 11, 1918, under the naval emergency fund, including the same objects specified for this purpose in the deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, and the naval appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1918 and 1919, $33,000,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I stated in the explanation of the bill in connection with the naval emergency fund, there was appropriated by the Congress $315,000,000 for naval emergency purposes. Two hundred and fifteen million dollars of that amount was carried in bills reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs and $100,000,000 of it was carried in a bill reported as a deficiency bill by the Committee on Appropriations, and which became law in October, 1917. There will be found on page 1184 of the hearings a table undertaking to set out in some detail allotments that were made under this appropriation of $315,000,000. In point of fact, there had been an overallotment of some $96,600,000, so that if the Government had carried out at the cost estimated all of the projects that were undertaken in connection with this naval emergency fund the Congress would have been called upon to appropriate an additional amount of $96,000,000. There has been expended out of this fund, as of November 1, 1918, $225,404,963.77. There were unpaid obligations of $186,199,812.11, or an overobligation of $96,604,775.88. There have been deductions by cancellations of $46,710,725. There have been reductions in work that was contemplated, but for which the Government was not obligated, of $16,580,178.81. So that there was a total reduction thereby of $63,290,903.81, which taken from the overobligation of $96,604,775.88 makes an existing deficiency of $33,313,872.07. We carry in this bill $33,000,000 in round figures because necessarily the estimates of odd dollars and cents were simply bookkeeping estimates, and there will be a variation more than sufficient one way or the other to deal with that. The purpose of carrying this money in this bill was to complete the building of destroyers that had been undertaken by the department. There will be found a statement in the hearings as to the amount of construction work that was undertaken by the Navy in connection with the appropriations under the naval emergency fund, and there will be found in the hearings of the Naval Committee, in connection with the Navy bill for 1920, a list of all of these various vessels. The Committee on Appropriations did not duplicate those tables, having before them the knowledge that they had been put into the hearings by the Committee on Naval Affairs. This is the situation briefly as I recall it, and I now refer to the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs. There were 76 destroyers, Nos. 110 to 185, inclusive, being built under the emergency fund, and destroyers, Nos. 186 to 335, inclusive, built under the appropriation "Increase of the Navy." Destroyers, Nos. 336 to 334, inclusive, are being built under the emergency funds that we are now dealing with. All of the destroyers that were being built as a result of the Navy emergency fund were in a state of completion running all the way from completion to as low as 22 per cent of completion in the way of hulls and machinery. A number of them had actually been completed. It was stated before the committee that these destroyers were of the modern type, 35-knot speed, that it was the desire of the department to finish them all; that not to finish them would be to waste a great deal of very valuable machinery and material that was in process of construction.

The impression has been held by some that this deficiency was to take care of matters relating to what are commonly described as Eagle boats, or submarine chasers. This is true, that this fund of $315,000,000, voted for the Navy to be spent in the discretion of the President for any purposes in connection with the prosecution of the war by the Navy, as he might see fit, was used for many purposes, including the building of Eagle boats. It is also true that if they were to take the balances that they are holding for the payment of certain work and use them for the payment of other work they could, for instance, pay for these destroyers and then leave to be paid for Eagle boats, or something else. But the matter as presented to the Committee on Appropriations—and there is no conflict, I may say, in the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations and before the Committee on Naval Affairs—showed certain expenditures and certain obligations that had to be met, and among the obligations that had to be met in order to bring them out whole under the emergency fund was $33,000,000 which they figure necessary for the completion of these destroyers. They first stated it as $36,000,000, and they came before the committee and said they expected to get from the naval appropriations committee the $36,000,000 with $25,000,000 more, the latter amount being to put back into condition various boats that had been chartered and taken over by the Navy from private owners, which, under the agreement by which they were taken over, had to be restored to their original condition.

Mr. BUTLER. Made over again.

Mr. SHERLEY. They said they would get the $36,000,000 and the $25,000,000 from the Committee on Naval Affairs in connection with this year's appropriations. I found on examination that they were $3,000,000 too high in their estimate of the item that is spoken of as the $36,000,000 item, so I brought to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that fact, and said that if he were going to allow these two items, instead of allowing $61,000,000 they ought to allow $58,000,000, because the Navy did not need the $3,000,000. Subsequently I was advised by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that the committee thought the $33,000,000 was a deficiency and as such ought to be carried by the Committee on Appropriations in this deficiency bill rather than carried in the appropriation for the Navy for the next fiscal year. I thereupon carried this item, and it is my understanding that the Committee on Naval Affairs has cut down the item they were going to carry of $61,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty million dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. For the sole purpose that I have indicated, of restoring vessels to the condition they were in when taken over from their owners. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations has had no option in regard to these matters, and by that I do not mean to imply that there has been anything necessarily done by the Navy in the use of this fund that ought not to have been done under the emergency which existed and confronted the country at the time when we were at war, but they got $315,000,000 and they got it largely upon the proposition that it was to be used for the purpose of building destroyers and other vessels to be used against the submarine menace.

They actually have used this money for a great many purposes. Gentlemen will find by looking at the table in the hearings to which I have referred that a lot of this money went not only to new construction, but it went to supplies and accounts, contingent, vessels purchased, charter of vessels from the Shipping Board, water supply, Hampton Roads, ordnance, navigation, and yards and docks. In point of fact the fund was used as an emergency fund for all manner of purposes in connection with the Navy and the various bureaus of the Navy, and the hearings disclose somewhat in detail all of the uses for which this money was expended and the condition of the balances. Now, when the naval representatives first came before the committee they came with the statement that they needed $125,000,000 as a deficiency to make good their overobligations under the Navy emergency fund. When they got through with the Committee on Appropriations they were satisfied that they needed only the $33,000,000 which we are here appropriating, and that is one of the instances of the value of a detailed examination on the part of officers bringing estimates before the Congress and the requiring of an actual financial showing as to balances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. There will be found in the hearings a statement as to cancellations, and it will be found as to the number of Eagle boats which were being built by the Ford Co. that they have canceled 52 out of 112 of Eagle boats for which they had contracted. The committee did not go into the question in detail as to whether they could cancel an additional number of these boats, although the statement was made that they had canceled, as far as the physical condition permitted the cancellation, and upon the showing made of the need of this money to complete these destroyers the committee recommends this amount to the Committee of the Whole for its approval.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word—just a formal motion. Mr. Chairman, I wish the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would permit me to ask him, or I wish that he would make a statement here now in connection with this item, touching any plan he may have in his mind, if he has a plan, by which a nearer association could be had between these military committees and the Committee on Appropriations in the consideration of deficiency appropriations. Before the chairman makes it, however, I want him to know there is no criticism whatsoever of this appropriation. The Navy Department has expended a great deal of this money and obligated the Government to pay more than it has already expended, I suppose. This fund has to be created and made up, and has to be paid out. I very greatly regret, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of this committee will not be a Member of the next House of Representatives. While he and I are not, perhaps, in entire accord all the way through politically, I want to bear open testimony not only to his diligence while he has been a Member of this House but to his absolute reliability and sensible—yes, brilliant—service, and I do not feel like criticizing any item he might report. The country will need him, as the gentleman from Illinois yesterday well said, badly. While his successor is a Republican and comes on this side, it is my regret that both of them could not be Members of this House. I believe the country will need Mr. SHERLEY in the next session; need men like him. I know it is not fashionable to be an economist and I know it is not popular to stand between the bureaus and the Treasury. Everybody is against such a man; but, nevertheless, we have to drift back to the time when we must be economical or else the people of this country will make up their minds that men who are not at all times doing their best to obtain relief from oppression will be excused from membership in this House. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me—and I am not looking to any prospective interest whatever, because I do not know I will even be a Member of the House of Representatives or be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs hereafter—I do want the gentleman before he goes away to say whether or not he has in his mind some plan, some way, by which the appropriations committees can be brought in closer touch with each other when considering deficiency appropriations. I say, without reflection upon anyone connected with these military bureaus, and have absolute confidence in them; but, notwithstanding, I do believe at times appropriations are asked for from these regular committees when the gentlemen asking for them have made up their minds that they would go to another committee and ask a deficiency, and therefore do not submit to the committee having charge of the appropriation originally all of the necessities which required a greater appropriation. If the gentleman will make a reply, I shall be very greatly indebted to him.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall be glad very briefly to state to the gentlemen and the committee what the situation is as I see it, and what the remedy in a measure is. It is not, of course, fair to judge the work of either the Congress or the departments by the conditions that have existed for the past year, because of the war breaking as it did and the need for action all of us were willing that the departments might have a leeway and might go forward with necessary work rather than to wait upon the deliberations of legislative action. I think that where the departments have exercised proper judgment in things they undertook they are not to be censured, because they did not always wait to have the exact amount of money provided. There have been, however, a few instances in which the disposition on the part of Congress apparently has been availed of by the departments to go forward when they could not come to the Congress in respect to every case.

Now, personally I have never believed in the distribution of appropriation matters among many committees, because I believe that it is impossible for any committee dealing simply with appropriations along certain lines to have that vision touching general expenditures that is necessary to a sound judgment as to whether or not a given thing should be appropriated for. Two questions are always involved in every appropriation. First, is the thing itself desirable? And, second—and frequently the second consideration is more important than the first—assuming that it is desirable, is it permissible, having in view the need of doing other things and the aggregate of the burden that will be placed upon the people if these various things are carried out? In other words, the real thing that is difficult for a legislative body to determine is not simply the value of a proposal itself, but the sum total of burdens that you have a right to place upon the people, having in mind that the Government has nothing of itself and only gets its moneys through tax burdens laid upon the people. Even with our archaic method of appropriations through many committees, I believe that in normal times, and from now on, it ought to be possible for the different bureaus so to present their estimates that they would not create deficiencies. I think there ought to be brought home to them that hereafter men who come with deficiencies will come with a knowledge of the penal statute that has been passed touching the making of deficiencies.

I have endeavored as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to consult informally whenever I could with the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and other appropriation committees, in order that the committee might not do the very thing that the gentleman suggests has been possible, giving something that had been refused by the other committees. The Committee on Appropriations ought not to be a court for a rehearing of matters which have been refused by committees having the power to appropriate in the first instance. And I think I can say that it has not been such in the days that I have had charge of it. My own judgment is that you can consolidate appropriations in the hands of one committee, or, at least, you can consolidate the total that may be appropriated by any committee in the hands of one committee. Whenever that is suggested men say, "How on earth are people going to do the work when they have difficulty in doing the work that is even before them now?" The answer to that lies in this fact, that nine-tenths of the work that is done in the way of examination, the question and answer, would be unnecessary if you had a modern system of bookkeeping and would have a statement of estimates, and an independent audit answerable to the Congress of the United States and not to the administrative branch of the Government. You would then be able by that audit to put your finger upon the sore spot and investigate it. The trouble now is that the Congress, having no other medium, undertakes to prevent abuses by detailed appropriation and detailed restriction, and its time is taken up with many matters that ought to be passed pro forma, with the result that great policies of government can not be dealt with and determined by Congress. And as the years roll around more and more the executive branch of the Government is determining a policy and Congress is being called upon to carry it out by appropriation of money.

Mr. MADDEN. It will be perfectly feasible, I have no doubt, to have subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee to represent each department, and then have the committee itself coordinate all the appropriations?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is true, and I think the very fact that you have all matters coming into a central committee would result in the clerical force of that committee keeping check on things for the benefit of the various subcommittees. I know that every subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations constantly has brought to its attention by the clerk and his assistants matters that come in some other bill and yet have a bearing, so that these subcommittees may not cross each other's program or may not recommend something in conflict with the view of another subcommittee. And I want to say now that the Committee on Appropriations, I think, has earned a reputation for efficiency in the Congress, and I do not mean the committee since I have been the chairman of it. It earned that long before I ever came to Congress. For many, many years it has justified the faith of the Congress in its conservatism and its industry. A reason for that is very largely the atmosphere which has grown up in that committee and which every new member, when he comes on it, feels; and it has been handed down from man to man and been made possible largely through the continuity of action and of purpose brought about by the very splendid services of the former clerk and the present clerk of that committee. And much of this efficiency is due to the fact that there is kept for the benefit of the committee continuous information in regard to the activities of the Government that enables the members to pursue a consistent policy. I have seen man after man come on that committee rather liberal in their views touching expenditures, and after coming in touch with the experience of that committee, which runs back forty and more years, become the most conservative, constructive members of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are all very much interested in this question, and I would like to ask the chairman whether or not these reforms which he suggests would come in a large measure by changing the rules of the House relative to the matter, or would it require substantial legislation in the nature of a statute?

Mr. SHERLEY. I believe some of them could be made by changing the rules of the House, but I believe it would be reenforced by virtue of the last year's experience. We ought to undertake to do for the Government in connection with the estimates of appropriations exactly what we undertook to do in connection with the financial system of the Government. Men may differ one way or another with the recommendations that were made by the Commission on Monetary Reform, but no man who wants to be frank and candid but what knows that the work that that commission did laid the groundwork that made possible the present banking and currency system.

Now, I believe that it is easily possible—and I hope to do so, if the committee agrees with me—to present to the House, in connection with one of the final deficiency bills, a proposal looking to the appointment of a commission composed of a limited number of Members of the House and the Senate and the Secretary of the Treasury, and giving to them a fund of $100,000 or $200,000, in order that they may have the clerical force necessary to gather together the data to report back to Congress a plan for a financial system.

I do not believe that any plan that is suggested will meet the views of everybody. There will be much that men will take exception to. But if that commission does its work intelligently and has available the technical assistance that it can obtain, it ought to be able to present to the Congress the fundamentals for such a reform. Some of those reforms will require statutory enactment, and some of them will require a change in the rules. If it had been my fortune to be a Member of the next Congress I had hoped to give a great deal of my time to that sort of a reform, which I believe will be the greatest that could possibly be brought about. And if it is brought about, there ought to be easily made a system whereby Congress can ascertain the facts that it is entitled to know without having to try each estimate as we would try a lawsuit. To-day the Parliament of Great Britain does not undertake to specify in detail anything like what Congress does, but the most powerful body in England is the independent audit that exists there, and that is always available to committees on expenditures in Parliament, and through its recommendations and suggestions it enables those committees to go to the sore spots and correct conditions.

Now, we can not adopt the English system as such for many reasons, and we ought not to want to. Every nation works out a plan of its own. It has habits and an evolution that can not be disregarded. But the American people certainly have enough constructive statesmanship to enable them to work out a modern system that will not be out of harmony with our divisions of power and our double legislative bodies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the committee allow me two or three minutes, to ask another question of the gentleman from Kentucky and also obtain his answer in that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. It has been a little bit disappointing to me, Mr. Chairman, while sitting on this one committee that I have served on for 22 years, to find out, after a great effort to limit appropriations to the needs of a department or a particular bureau, that it transpires or appears in the making of the next appropriation bill that the same bureau officers had gone to the Committee on Appropriations for a deficiency. Until the reform that the gentleman speaks of—and I am in entire accord with him, and I know that it is in the right direction—could be brought about, would it not be well to have a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs and a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs meet with a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations at the time these deficiencies are being considered, so that these committees having in charge those subjects originally might be able further to inform the Committee on Appropriations what their views might be and what the actions of their committees had been?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have tried a number of times to get members of other committees to confer with me, and I have had difficulty in bringing it about promptly enough to enable me to attend to the business before the committee. I think it ought to be possible to have informal conferences, and a practice might very well grow up of having the Committee on Appropriations present informal memoranda of estimates that are sent to it from the Navy Department to the Committee on Naval Affairs and receive information from the Committee on Naval Affairs, if that committee wanted to submit its views or information in connection with the estimates. They have always been welcome to do it heretofore, and I have welcomed them when they came to me with reference to supplemental estimates that had been submitted. But you are going to get a reform in the way of total expenditures when you determine first the total amount that you will spend for a given purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Exactly.

Mr. SHERLEY. For instance, if the Navy Department found that it was to have $500,000,000 to spend during a given year and knew that that was going to be the sum total, then you would have every department of the Navy working against every other department to get its share and suggesting methods by which you could cut out unnecessary things. Instead of that, what you have now is each one of the departments pulling together to help increase the sum total.

Mr. BUTLER. Would not that be worked out through the gentleman's plan of a budget system?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. I think that could be worked out through the budget plan I suggested to the Congress a good many years ago and got defeated on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make a pro forma amendment in order to obtain some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House. I have listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] with much interest. A budget system is frequently talked about without much of knowledge. Perhaps you could work it out through the audit referred to, and I have no objection to a commission being created to investigate. The trouble about it, however, is that the term of the Executive is for four years, and the term of a Senator is for six years, and the House entirely must come in or go out every two years.

Now, in Great Britain and, so far as I know, in all other countries having a budget system, so called, when the budget is turned down the ministry preparing it goes to the country and inside of 60 or 90 days the ministry is either sustained or turned down. If it is not sustained, when they come to return the members of the House of Commons, for instance, of Great Britain a new ministry is formed, and there you have a response to the public sentiment by a fairly prompt change of the policy of the Government touching the matter or general matters that are referred to. Without an amendment to our Constitution we can not have that.

I should be very glad to see—and still I do not have much hope for it—all the appropriation bills handled by one committee. I think perhaps you might make a committee of 12 or 14 or 16 and then let the various committees charged with legislation take the chairman of the committee and the head of the minority into consultation when the bill for that department is being perfected, and after full consideration you could come to some kind of an agreement.

I had some experience away back yonder when Speaker Carlisle was first elected Speaker. There was a contest as to whether Carlisle or Randall should be Speaker. Both were good Democrats, except that Randall was not "orthodox"; he was a protection Democrat. Mr. Carlisle defeated him, under the leadership, in their caucus and in the House, of my former colleague, William R. Morrison, a man of extraordinary ability. He wanted to go at the head of Ways and Means, and did. You could not turn Randall down, because he had a very strong following on his own side of the House, and he went to Appropriations.

Morrison, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a tariff bill which bore his name and was popularly known as the Morrison horizontal bill. It was supposed to have the support of the Democrats in the House and that of the President, but Mr. Randall, who was an outspoken protectionist, and a score more of Democrats voted with the Republicans and struck out the enacting clause, defeating the first effort of a Democratic House to enact tariff legislation. Morrison did not forget nor forgive Randall, and when the Forty-ninth Congress met he proposed a new rule distributing the appropriation bills. That rule was adopted, not as an economic reform, but as political revenge, to cripple the man who had been three times Speaker and was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Democrats concluded to cripple him, and divided the bills as they are now divided under the rules of the House. Well, what was the result? In the Fifty-first Congress I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and we had followed suit, you know. They had divided on the bills when Mr. Carlisle was Speaker. I called together all the chairmen of committees that had appropriation bills to consult as to what the revenues were and see if we could not come to an agreement. Nothing doing. Each chairman was like a hen with one chicken. You know a hen with 1 chicken makes more fuss than a hen with 16 chickens. The motherly hen with 16 chickens marches with dignity and clucks occasionally, and the chickens follow; but the hen with one chicken runs the legs off her poor little chick, worrying and bothering around, and does not have any regard for any other mother hen with 16 chickens.

Mr. BUTLER. How about a hen with no chicken at all?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is an expert in poultry matters, and I will not answer his question according to the facts. In private I will answer him. [Laughter.]

Now, what has happened? As it was under the former rules the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so on, were chargeable with legislation. When the appropriation bills were reported they could come into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and criticize and move to amend, and the Committee of the Whole, after discussion, amended or failed to amend, according to conditions. Well, now, what has happened? The practice has grown up that each committee chargeable with legislation just hitches its appropriation onto the legislation, and as the money has got to be appropriated, the legislation is frequently dragged through without sufficient consideration. That does not result to the public good. If I had power I would go back and adopt the rules that we had before the disagreement between the two wings of the Democratic Party in the Forty-ninth Congress, which divided these bills. I would go back and adopt the rules that we had then. Oh, there are 435 of us now, and I have no idea that I can work it out. We will have to have a commission and full consideration; but I would have responsibility with power concentrated, so as properly to organize the House of Representatives, subject to the action of the House in indorsing the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: For maintenance of naval training station, Great Lakes, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $457,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations inform the House as to what is contemplated in the way of improvements at this largest of all naval training stations, that located at Great Lakes, Ill.? I know they have had as high as nearly 50,000 apprentices and seamen there during the peak of the training season for the war. What is contemplated now in this appropriation aggregating nearly half a million dollars?

Mr. SHERLEY. This particular item of $457,000 is purely for maintenance. They submitted an item for $1,250,000, which included both maintenance and betterment at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station. The committee had pretty full hearings in connection with all of the training stations, and I do not know anything concerning which we had as much difficulty in coming to a real understanding and conclusion.

Now, the situation broadly is this: The Navy went ahead with all of these various training stations and created them and enlarged them by various work, undertaken without having come to Congress for any appropriation; and twice in the past they came to the Committee on Appropriations and represented that they had spent certain moneys and that we must appropriate to pay the bills because the money was actually spent. They came once just two days before an adjournment was to take place, with an estimate that the committee very promptly threw out of doors because we were furnished with no information as to the money that the department wanted to spend. The result of that was that they just went ahead and spent it anyway and came back with estimates for actual deficiencies. Now, I can not tell the gentleman from memory what is the situation at Great Lakes Training Station, but the gentleman will find on page 453 of the hearings a statement totaling $1,750,000 for various and sundry purposes in connection with Great Lakes Training Station. Instead of allowing that, what we did was to allow the amount of $457,000, which it was estimated was necessary as a maintenance fund proper, and then when it came to the question of maintenance under the Bureau of Yards and Docks for all of the naval stations we gave them $6,000,000, which amount was supposed to be sufficient to take care of the construction work that had to be carried through at these various stations. Now, I have this impression in regard to these various naval stations: That a great deal of work incident to the war has been undertaken, and that every commandant at every one of these yards is now desirous of going forward with that work irrespective of the termination of the war, and I believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs, who seem to be desirous of undertaking additional work, including the deficiency estimates, could do no better work than to go into all these expenditures. In point of fact I am not at all sure but what it would be well worth the while of the Congress to have a committee of two or three members of the Committee on Naval Affairs to visit these various stations and to ascertain the actual conditions. It is almost impossible to obtain the information from a recital by witnesses. We cut down the amount quite considerably.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House what was the total estimate asked by the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which, I believe, has charge of the building and enlargement of these various stations?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Bureau of Yards and Docks asked for $6,500,009, as I recall, and in asking that they figured an expenditure of about $1,000,000 at Great Lakes. To that extent that $1,000,000 was a duplicate of estimates made for the Great Lakes. What we did was to give them $6,000,000, as against the $6,500,000 they asked for, and to eliminate $700,000 of the estimate from the Great Lakes Station. So that if you were to take all of the estimates made by the various training stations and the Bureau of Yards and Docks together it would total in round figures nearly seven and a quarter million dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee virtually shaved the estimates to the extent of a million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is all we could do. It was not possible to come to a conclusion without a physical examination and very detailed statements. We had the various commandants of these yards come before us. There are a good many pages of testimony as to conditions, but here is the situation, the gentleman is familiar with it: A man says certain work has been undertaken and that it is necessary to complete it. You may think it is unnecessary to complete it, but unless it is a very glaring case and the fellow lacks the ingenuity that most of them possess of making a plausible case, you are defenseless. What we thought is this: I got an impression from the hearings before the committee that the present head of the Bureau of Yards and Docks has a real appreciation of economy and desires to hold down expenditures. He was one of the few officers who voluntarily called to the attention of the committee moneys not needed which could be eliminated. Therefore, instead of giving to this particular station the money that could be expended, we lumped the money under the control of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and placed the responsibility upon him, to see to it that the moneys are expended only as needed. Then, by giving him an amount less than all the yards needed, we put the yards bidding against each other and thereby bringing about economy.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that was the only practical course to follow.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to call the attention of the chairman of this committee to one item in this bill, and I hope what I may say will make an impression on him. That is in regard to this appropriation for the little training station in California at Yerba Buena Island. It is found on page 11. I know that this money has been spent or obligated at this point—I believe honestly spent—and I have no criticism to make, but it is a disappointment to find a definite appropriation for a place that we anticipate may soon be abandoned.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, that was a deficiency that occurred last year.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been endeavoring, with my colleague from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] and others, to hold down appropriations on these small places.

Mr. SHERLEY. This was the situation here——

Mr. BUTLER. I do not ask the gentleman to make any explanation, for I know his explanation will be reasonable.

Mr. SHERLEY. They had 4,500 men there, and it required a great deal of maintenance and construction in order to take care of them, and they ran over to the extent of $22,000.

Mr. BUTLER. If we had our hand on it and had it in mind, if they had stated to us in the last appropriation bill that they would need this money and that they would like to have us make that appropriation——

Mr. SHERLEY. I doubt very much if they knew it. They were expending so fast and working at these places under such pressure that they never knew from week to week what their balance was.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no criticism to make; I know what we have gone through. We have all been feverish, greatly disturbed and agitated, but I want to promise the gentleman from Kentucky that if I am a member of the Naval Committee in the next House I will, for one, make an effort to have methods of proving estimates and obtaining appropriations corrected.

Mr. SHERLEY. While I am on my feet I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that is I believe that if they will investigate into the practice that has grown up under the authority given some years ago at the instance of the Committee on Naval Affairs, touching general account of advances, they will find that it is a method that does not give the Congress proper control over funds but enables the Naval Establishment to build up reserves without the knowledge of this House and puts a premium on expenditure of all moneys that are appropriated here rather than to have any balances turned back into the Treasury. Every time you examine a naval officer upon that point he squirms and boxes the compass, but the fact remains that they are constantly building up reserves through that medium, and you can not make something out of nothing.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a question about the item on page 12, the naval training station on the Great Lakes. I have just sent for the appropriation act for 1919. What is the exact purpose of this appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I explained that a few moments ago.

Mr. LITTLE. I was not in the House at that time.

Mr. SHERLEY. The purpose was to take care of the maintenance for the balance of the year—maintenance, buildings, repairs, water system—just the upkeep account.

Mr. LITTLE. Is this to be a permanent station?

Mr. SHERLEY. It has been a permanent station and will always be, probably, one of the great stations of the Navy.

Mr. LITTLE. There have been a great many boys sent there from our country to be trained for the war and they have not been sent home. Can the gentleman give us any information as to when and how soon they are to be sent home? The officers seem to think that though the boys were sent there to learn something of war they ought to be kept there indefinitely, at their sweet will. Of course, I understand the station is a permanent one. What I seek to ascertain is as to the disposition to make the temporary war-time conditions permanent, so that some officers shall have more authority and larger commands.

Can the gentleman give me any information as to when they are going to send those boys home? What the plans are?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee had some hearings about that from the Bureau of Navigation and from various officers. The Navy claims that it is in a situation that is different from that of the Army, that a good part of its task increased or at least remained as great after the armistice as during the war time, that they have to move all of the soldiers back home, and that they are also looked to to supply the personnel for the merchant marine. They insist that they can not demobilize down to the last man or go back immediately to the condition that existed prior to the war, that as far as they are concerned they are practically operating upon a war basis, excluding the ships that were overseas in active war work, just as much now as they were some months ago, and I think it is somewhat true.

I realize the protests that have been made. I have received a number of them myself, as all of us have, and I have been told—and this is in the hearings—that these commandants at these various stations will investigate the conditions surrounding the individual applicant for discharge, and where they can without hurt to the service release him, they will do so, but that of necessity it is going to be a slower process than it would seem necessary to the average man, who does not know what the burdens are that have been placed upon them.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a tendency down there to believe that they can keep men indefinitely who were sent there for war purposes. If the officers have such an exaggerated idea of their power as that, and show this arbitrary disposition to handle the young men from out West, who ought now to be in school or at work, whom they are arbitrarily keeping from school or from useful occupations—keeping them there at such work as shoveling coal when they could secure in Chicago plenty of men who are out of work to do it—then it is a most unfortunate situation. There can be but one result of that, and that is to bring to the American mind, at least to the mind of the people whose sons are held in violation of the contract, the idea that these men are purely an arbitrary set of men, who are not fit to be intrusted with the funds or the youth of this Republic. If the friends of the Navy expect very much support from the agricultural sections of the country, where the people pay the taxes to support the Navy, they may believe that when war is on we will do everything we can; but they should also realize that when peace comes the Navy becomes of comparatively small moment as compared with the general necessities. The farmers and the business men run the schools and support this Navy, and if the Navy is going to proceed in the way of getting in the way of the schools and the farmers, then that attitude is bound to result in the feeling against it that will make it difficult for any Congressman from such a community to support it. If the Navy has any friends in this House, and it has many, I hope they will explain to these people that they can not expect to get good results from the taxpayers who are treated in this arbitrary manner. I shall not make any objection to this appropriation, although sometimes I think it ought to be done; but I do hope we will not be placed in a position where we can not do for the Navy what we want to do because of arbitrary, egotistical, martinet methods of some petty gentlemen who do not seem to realize that in time of peace they are about the smallest cogs in the machinery of this great Republic. This country is conducted purely for the benefit of those who fight its battles in war, pay its taxes in peace, and support its families from generation to generation, not to please immaculate personages whose existence actually depends on the labors of those whose sons they appropriate when they should be in school or at work earning the money to pay the salaries of the immaculates.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Engineering: For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $30,882.14.

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $4,300,000.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee about this entire appropriation for steam engineering, the whole amount being $4,300,000. Just what is it for?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is really a repair item in connection with the ships that have been in commission and that need to be repaired, and the gentlemen will find on page 565 of the hearings the statements of Rear Admiral Robert S. Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and Admiral Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. As I recall the testimony, they had had under the heading of engineering something like $107,000,000 and they had expended about $65,000,000 and had about $42,000,000 as an unexpended balance. They had $13,000,000 worth of outstanding obligations, which left them a free balance of something over $28,000,000. They estimated that with the number of ships that had been in commission and that were coming in for repairs that sum would be insufficient, and they asked for this additional amount in order to make these repairs. I did my best to convince Admiral Griffin that he would not need all of that amount of money, and in point of fact the committee did cut him down from an estimate of something like $8,000,000 for additional moneys to $4,300,000. Three million dollars of that cut, however, represents $3,000,000 which was intended to be expended in the creation of a radio station south of the sleet line, and I am very glad the gentleman's inquiry has brought this to my attention. It is proper that I call attention to it in order that the House, if it does not agree with the judgment of the committee, may increase the amount by $3,000,000. It was testified by Admiral Griffin that it was desirable to have an additional wireless station. It was originally undertaken as a war measure, having in mind the difficulty of always using wireless stations now owned by the Government in time of severe winter weather.

The severe weather of last winter seriously handicapped, at times, the use of wireless. It was determined, therefore, that it was desirable to have a station south of the sleet line, and that it was also desirable to have a very powerful station for use in connection with the South American countries. It developed before the committee that no moneys had actually been expended in regard to the building of this station. It may be that moneys had been expended under other appropriations in the procurement of land, but no money had been expended for the building of the station proper. The committee felt, under those conditions—although it was very strongly urged by the Navy Department that this should be carried out as a peace-time proposal and as a desirable thing—that it was a matter that ought to be left to the Committee on Naval Affairs to function on, and if, after a hearing, they saw fit to appropriate the money for that purpose, that they could do so. We were taking back moneys that were not needed. If this matter had been one in which expenditures had been made to such an extent as to make it necessary that it be completed, the committee would have acted. It is the one instance in which they found a situation involving a large sum of money proposed to be expended but which has not been expended at all, and they therefore cut the estimate of the Bureau of of Steam Engineering $3,000,000 in order to eliminate this expenditure until Congress should affirmatively authorize it.

Mr. ROWE. Did the committee understand that of this sum mentioned in the second line, page 17, $4,300,000, that $1,450,000 had been paid for the purchase of the ship-to-shore stations of the Marconi Co.?

Mr. SHERLEY. They understood there had been paid a million and a half dollars for the Marconi stations. The gentleman will find that in the testimony on page 565.

Mr. ROWE. I have that testimony. Does the gentleman know what those stations are used for?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I assume they are used——

Mr. ROWE. Are they part of the Navy?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, if they take them over they are a part of the Navy. Now, there was a situation like a good many others that came up. The Committee on Appropriations did not feel that it had the right to undertake to determine upon whether or not the Marconi stations ought to have been taken over. To have come to a conclusion about that would have required very considerable hearings.

Mr. ROWE. Did the gentleman know that such a bill had been introduced and had a hearing before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. On January 17; and they refused to report it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, I know; but I did not know they had refused to report it. I knew they had not reported it.

Mr. ROWE. That was for the very purpose of purchasing these stations?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt what the gentleman says is accurate. What does the gentleman think the committee ought to have done?

Mr. ROWE. Admiral Griffin testified before the Appropriations Committee, did he not, that the Marconi Co. had not been paid for these stations?

Mr. SHERLEY. What he said was this:

We have recently taken over all the Marconi stations, but have not paid for them yet. We will pay for them from this appropriation.

Then I asked him:

At what cost?

And he answered:

A little less than $1,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROWE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROWE. Your hearing was on December 10, and on December 12 Secretary Daniels, before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, testified, in talking about the Marconi system:

We paid $1,400,000.

And he was corrected, and said "$1,450,000."

That is in reference to Marconi stations; and then he also testified they paid $1,600,000 for the Federal Co. Is that also a part of this appropriation under the Bureau of Steam Engineering?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is none of it a part of the $4,300,000, except in this sense: We assumed if they did not pay for these various things they probably would have money to that extent so as to reduce the $4,300,000, but they did not say they wanted the $4,300,000 for this direct purpose, but I got the impression that, whether or not they were going actually to pay for these, they had entered into obligations for the purchase of these Marconi stations, and, therefore, that will be an obligation upon the Government. Now, I have no opinion one way or the other whether they ought or ought not to pay for these stations, except the general belief that the less we buy of commercial enterprises the better for the Government. We developed the facts as best we could as to what uses they had made of the various sums, but the committee did not feel that it was warranted in undertaking affirmatively to say that a thing of that sort should not be done. We developed the facts, and then if the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries wants to report out a bill or take any action to prevent this, why I should think they would proceed so to do.

Mr. ROWE. In the hearings before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Mr. HADLEY asked the Secretary of the Navy:

I would like to ask the Secretary at this point what is the specific item in the naval appropriation bill which carries the fund for that payment?

Secretary DANIELS. I have forgotten the title of it, but it is in the appropriation under the Bureau of Steam Engineering, which has direction and control of all radio matters. Under that appropriation we buy a tug, under that appropriation we buy a radio station whenever the Chief of Operations of the Navy and the General Board feel it ought to have them.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the gentleman is mistaken in that statement. What happened is this: We asked these departments to get up a table showing the amount of moneys they had received for different purposes. They made a statement showing the amount of money that they had received for engineering under the Bureau of Steam Engineering. Then they showed of that sum of money a given sum had been expended and that there was a Treasury balance of a certain sum and that they had obligations to a certain amount. We then undertook as far as we could to ascertain what the available balance was to be used for, but we did not go into the question of what moneys had already been expended, because as far as the committee's work was concerned that was water that had passed under the bridge and there was nothing we could do about it.

Now, they set out the various expenditures that they have made or have to make, and they showed that in order to go forward, assuming they carried on these various activities, they would require a certain amount of money for the rest of the fiscal year. That amount was stated as $8,000,000. Now, one of the items that went to make that $8,000,000 was this $3,000,00 I have spoken of. Inasmuch as that was a new thing, that had not been started, with no third-party obligation involved, we said, "You will not need that, and we can cut that much. And we think some of the other general statements as to the cost of repairs of ships, and so forth, and maintenance of radio stations could stand a little paring." And so we cut them, leaving the amount of $4,300,000.

But in order that we might not be misunderstood I took care in writing the report for the committee to expressly state that moneys that we left we did not mean should be usable for any particular purpose, and that we neither recommended nor disapproved those purposes. We left it for Congress to take such action as it saw fit in trying to develop the fact. Now, I am perfectly willing that Congress, if it does not desire to have these stations taken over, and knows how much obligation the Government has incurred that it can be relieved of, should legislate and say so. But it seems to me it would be asking almost an impossible task of the Committee on Appropriations to function on all of these various activities.

Mr. ROWE. I would like to ask one other question. Would the Committee on Appropriations feel under obligation to the Director of Railroads if he had bought the Baltimore & Ohio to appropriate the sum in a deficiency bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Director of Railroads had bought the Baltimore & Ohio under authority of law.

Mr. ROWE. You are putting in a word there——

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to answer. If he had bought the Baltimore & Ohio under authority of law, so as to make a valid obligation upon the Government, I think the Congress would have to appropriate the money to pay that obligation.

Mr. ROWE. Suppose he had not that authority?

Mr. SHERLEY. If he had not the authority of law, I would not vote him the money for that purpose, and I am not voting any money yet for the purpose of paying for Marconi stations.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Does the gentleman understand that under this item for the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the last naval appropriation bill there is any authority given to the Secretary of the Navy to take over this Marconi system throughout the country?

Mr. SHERLEY. I neither know whether there is or is not. I have not examined into the question.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. My impression is that there is not, and I find that at the end of that particular section it provides that the sum to be paid out of the appropriation for purchase of land or sites for radio shore stations shall not exceed $10,000. The difficulty, it seems to me, is that the Navy Department goes out and expands and arrogates to itself powers the Congress has never given to it, and then it comes in here and asks that the things it has done without authority of law shall be ratified by an appropriation to take care of its expenditures.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is drawing a conclusion that is not warranted by facts in this instance. The appropriation of $4,300,000 does not add one iota to the power that may or may not exist in regard to the expenditure of money for stations. And the $10,000 limitation to which the gentleman refers would be a limitation on this $4,300,000 just as much as it was on the original sum.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The trouble, as I understand the situation, is that in asking for this $4,300,000 it was suggested that one of the purposes to which that fund should be applied was to pay for the Marconi station which had been purchased by the department at the expenditure of approximately $1,500,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman has misread the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. The hearing does not disclose that all or any part of this $4,300,000 was asked. In point of fact, that was not the sum they asked. What they testified was that with the moneys they heretofore received they expected, at a cost of $1,500,000 to take over the Marconi system. Now, as to whether they have the power or not, I have only this to say—that if they have not, they will not get by the Comptroller, and they can not use that fund. If they have, unless Congress indicates that they should not use it, I presume they can and will. The committee has no recommendation, because it did not undertake to function on whether or not the Marconi system should be taken. Now, we developed all the information we could—and that was simply incidental to a lot of other matters—as to expenditures that were to be made on properties to be bought by the Bureau of Steam Engineering. And if the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries feels itself justified in recommending to the Congress that the money should not be spent for such purpose, why, then, I hope they will bring such a matter to the House for consideration. If they say there is no law by which it can be spent, then I answer by saying that nothing in this bill creates the power.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the gentlemen will yield, I wish to say that in my judgment that is precisely what the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has in effect done. In the last Congress the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the committee and asked for legislation authorizing the taking over of the radio stations of this country, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries at that time refused to report any such bill. The department came before the committee in the pending session of Congress and asked for like legislation.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries unanimously laid that proposed legislation upon the table. The Secretary told us at that time that they had done this thing under the appropriation for steam engineering, carried in the naval appropriation act. As I read that act there is no authority for that action on the part of the Navy Department, and it looks to me as though it was now coming in here in this deficiency bill and getting a sum of money to pay for a thing which it had no right to buy; and when an appropriation is made and a sum of money is placed at its disposal which can be used for that purpose, then the Congress, so it seems to me, is ratifying an unjustifiable action on the part of the department. I express that opinion with great deference, because I have had very little experience here.

Mr. SHERLEY. I may be mistaken as to this, because I have not gone into this particular matter, but it is my understanding and my certain knowledge that the voting of this $4,300,000 does not in any sense enlarge the power which may or may not exist on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to take over the Marconi stations, because the language of the appropriation is this:

> For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, and so forth, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $4,300,000.

Now, if the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919 does not confer the power to take over these stations, manifestly the voting of moneys for the same purpose can not confer the power.

Now, here is the difficulty that confronts the Congress, not only as to this instance, but as to many others, and as to which I think there ought to be affirmative functioning by the Congress: As to any matter which the Navy or the Army proposes to go forward with that the Congress thinks it ought not to go forward with, the Congress ought by affirmative legislation to say to the departments that they shall not go forward, for this reason: It is practically impossible to reach the matter financially. Here great sums have been appropriated for broad, general purposes. The taking away of any particular sum from these large amounts would still leave sums so vast that they could still be used for some purpose that the Congress would not want them to be used for. We are very much in the situation of a man who may have a lake of many hundreds of acres that can be used for the irrigation of thousands of acres of land. If he draws off a certain amount of water on the theory that he does not want to irrigate a certain section of the land it does not follow that there is not still enough water to irrigate that section, although some other section may be neglected. The same is true here. If you take away a little sum from them they have still got moneys enough to go ahead with those things; and the way to reach them is to affirmatively prevent them from doing it.

Now, if the Committee on Appropriations had come in here and said that they shall not do this or that or the other thing, every committee in this House would have been on our backs, saying that we undertake the functions of the entire House. I share very much the gentleman's own view, without having gone into it very much, against taking over the Marconi stations. My impression has been against it, just as my impression has been against the taking over of many other commercial activities by the Government. But for the committee to have refused to grant this sum of money would simply not have reached the matter, but would have denied them moneys which they claimed they needed for certain purposes.

Mr. ROWE. But this is not the only item—this item of $4,300,000. There is an item of $1,600,000 besides that spent for the purchase of the Federal Co., which, before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the Secretary himself testified he had purchased and paid for. That is coming out of some fund or other. If we are to pass appropriations like this for deficiencies we thereby pay for something that we would not have done as a House and which we had not authorized.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman in one breath says that the Navy Department has bought something and then in the next breath he says we pass over a fund to buy something that we would not have authorized the payment for.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is mistaken. The Federal Co., he testified, he had paid for.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will ask the gentleman what he would do?

Mr. ROWE. I would strike out the appropriation on the next page of $4,300,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. What effect would that have as to money paid to the Federal Co.?

Mr. ROWE. It would be notice to the Secretary of the Navy not to go on and buy other plants. It would not give them the money.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be. We have not given them the money to squander, assuming that it has been squandered, for the purpose of buying these various wireless stations.

Mr. MANN. They say they are going to do it out of this money.

Mr. SHERLEY. They say that out of the moneys they now have certain amounts are to be expended for certain purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it may be possible that we are discussing the paragraph a little early, because it is to the next paragraph in the bill that we are really directing attention. The current naval appropriation act contains an item under the head of "Bureau of Steam Engineering," which I shall not read in full, because it is a long item, but I shall read all that in any possible way could be taken as referring to the subject matter. I read:

Engineering: For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels—

Except certain things; then—searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service, including expenses of office of director of naval communications and the purchase of land as necessary for sites for radio shore stations—instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work in radiotelegraphy at the naval radio laboratory.

And so forth—

The paragraph is long and goes into very detailed particulars. It authorizes repairs, preservation, and renewals of electrical interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except certain electrical appliances on vessels, purely internal. Then it provides for purchase of technical books and apparatus for experimental and research work in radiotelegraphy at the naval radio laboratory. It authorizes the purchase of land for radio stations, with a proviso that not more than $10,000 of the appropriation shall be used for that purpose, and it makes an appropriation for everything of $50,000,000.

Mr. JUUL. From what is the gentleman quoting?

Mr. MANN. I am reading the paragraph in the naval appropriation law now current. Now, there is not a line in this particularly detailed appropriation which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to buy anything connected with the radiotelegraph, except for maintenance and certain things for experiment, and $10,000 for land.

Utterly regardless of law, in violation of the law, for which he ought to be impeached and removed from office—and it is not unlikely that he may be—he has gone ahead and spent money out of this appropriation for the purchase of radio systems—or at least, it is stated, one system—and has agreed to spend $1,500,000 for the purchase of another system. He came before this Congress and asked authority to make these purchases and was refused the authority. If he had the authority he did not need to ask Congress for it, and the failure of Congress to legislate on the subject is a refusal of authority. He was refused the authority, and then calmly, without any excuse except his own will, he proceeds, in violation of the law and in contempt of the Appropriations Committee and of Congress, to spend part of the money appropriated, and to obligate the Government, as he says, to make a further appropriation to carry out his illegal program.

Now, I am not criticizing the Committee on Appropriations. They did not have very much information before them on this subject. The Appropriations Committee, in the consideration of a deficiency bill, consider practically all the activities of the Government. They do not have a great deal of time to spend on one item.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman's request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. They had short hearings on this subject. The Navy Department sent an estimate asking for a little over $8,000,000 and a deficiency appropriation under this item, the Bureau of Steam Engineering. I now read from their estimate:

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $8,109,433.

There is nothing in that to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to what it was for. There is nothing in the original item to call the attention of anybody to what it is proposed to use this money for. The wildest dreamer in a nightmare would not have supposed that there was any authority in this original $50,000,000 appropriation for the purchase of radio systems, and there is not any such authority. But the Secretary of the Navy, having been turned down by the committee of the House with legislative jurisdiction over this subject, the House committee having unanimously rejected his proposals, he proceeds in another way, and an admiral—I suppose he was an admiral—comes before the Committee on Appropriations and makes several statements. Under the request for this item in this bill, "Marconi stations," the chairman says:

None of that has been paid for.

Admiral GRIFFIN. Some has. I suppose five or six hundred thousand dollars. We have recently taken over all the Marconi stations, but have not paid for them yet. We will pay for them from this appropriation.

He is talking about the estimate of $8,000,000 that he is asking for—

The CHAIRMAN. At what cost?

Admiral GRIFFIN. A little less than $1,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. They are to be Government owned?

Admiral GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it proposed to own all the wireless stations in America?

Admiral GRIFFIN. I think the Secretary wants to do that.

And so forth.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. I will when I am through here. I think we will make better progress in that way. Then I will be very glad to yield.

Admiral Griffin, again in another part of the hearing a little later, talking about the amount of money that he wanted for a deficiency appropriation, says—

To this are added the issues to ships, the upkeep of radio stations, new radio stations, the purchase which we have made of the Marconi stations, and an estimate for our European expenditures.

Still talking about the appropriation he was asking for, including the purchase from the Marconi Co. And again, on page 577—

The CHAIRMAN. What amount of money are you figuring to spend on radio stations?

Admiral GRIFFIN. We will spend $4,550,000.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the occasion for all that expenditure?

Admiral GRIFFIN. One million four hundred and fifty thousand dollars is for the purchase of the Marconi shore stations, which we have already effected. Three million dollars is for the erection of radio stations at Monroe, N. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Who authorized that?

Admiral GRIFFIN. The President.

The CHAIRMAN. To be paid for from what funds?

Admiral GRIFFIN. From "Engineering."

The CHAIRMAN. Did Congress ever authorize it?

Admiral GRIFFIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by the President has authorized it?

Admiral GRIFFIN. He approved it. The Secretary took that up with him and he approved the erection of a station there.

Seeking to lay the blame on the President, whom I am willing to acquit. The President approved the location of a radio station at Monroe, N. C., but the President did not undertake to say there was any appropriation for it. He was lied to by somebody. He did not examine the appropriation bill to find that there was no such authority there in the law. On the contrary, there was authority to spend $10,000, and only $10,000, out of $50,000,000 for the purchase of land for a radio station. They seek to hide under the cover of the President authorizing this to be done. He did not authorize it. He approved the location.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, the Committee on Appropriations cut out the $3,000,000 for that station, properly, and I think the House ought to cut out the balance of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Every dollar of it.

Mr. MANN. It is proposed to spend $1,450,000 out of this appropriation to pay the Marconi system people for the job that they have unloaded on the Government. Of course, we could refuse to appropriate the $1,450,000, but that would not do any good. They would pay the Marconi system out of the appropriations already made, and use the deficiency appropriation for necessary things between now and June 30. The only way to prevent them from spending the $1,450,000 is to strike this paragraph out of the bill entirely. This is not the last deficiency bill that will be reported to this House. There will be a general deficiency bill at the end of this session of Congress. There will be plenty of time for the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain from these men in the Navy Department—and I came pretty near using another word than men, crooks in this connection—what they want the deficiency appropriation for, and to provide that it shall not be given to them if they have meanwhile squandered, stolen, the $1,450,000 which they have illegally agreed to pay to the Marconi system. [Applause.] We will give them all the money they legally and properly need; we will give them all the money that they can legitimately use. I never in my experience in this House have seen such wanton contempt of Congress as is exhibited in this transaction. The Secretary of the Navy, swelled with his important position, properly so, probably, desires to have the Navy control all the wireless systems, as another gentleman desires to have the Government control all the land telegraph systems, and Congress having declined to give him that authority, he goes ahead and executes his authority regardless of law. When Congress has turned him down in its legislative committee he walks into the appropriation room and, through subterfuge, attempts to get the money to carry out the transaction, illegal to begin with, and only made legal when we appropriate money for it. If we appropriate the money for it, the transaction is legitimatized. If we do not appropriate the money, he has been guilty of a high misdemeanor in his office, for which he ought to be punished. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, almost every day I am here I have more reason to think that this House should be more careful in investigating the evidence upon which it appropriates money. Oftentimes it is based purely on the statement of some little fellow down in the department, the value of whose statement depends on the common sense of the man who makes it. I have in my hand a clipping from a paper known as the Official Bulletin of the Great Lakes Station handed me by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER], who is under the weather to-day, and does not feel like giving it the attention it deserves. This bulletin is a paper that is evidently paid for by the taxpayers' money appropriated by this Congress, and placed in the hands of the naval authorities. I find one of its principal purposes is to discredit the representatives of the American people with the money that the representatives vote from the taxpayers to enable these little fellows to print these bulletins. They say here, at the top of the column, "Orders and notices appearing under this heading have received the approval of the commandant and are official." The commandant is discussing the question of discharging men from the service who enlisted with the expectation of serving through the war and who want to go home, go to school, or go to work. It appears that they have, so this clipping reads, a "plan now being observed which seeks to effect the granting of such requests according to the degree of urgency existing in each case as determined by the statements of the applicants, supporting affidavits, and the investigation of the heads of departments, regimental commanders, and other immediate superiors." If these men have any explanation of what appears to be a gross breach of discipline on their part, they should make it.

It appears that the boy can file an application and bring an affidavit from anybody he knows with one exception. He can bring a letter from the mayor of his town, but not from a Member of Congress, as you will see in a moment. If a Member of Congress who knows the boy writes a similar letter to that of the mayor or the sister, the boy will be relegated to the bottom of this list. That seems to be the penalty attached to the boy who solicits a statement from some Congressman he happens to know. Heads of departments, regimental commanders, and other "superiors" can be heard without injury to the service, but when inferiors like Congressmen say a good word for the boy the lash is laid across his back. Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he hath grown so great that a representative of the people endangers their safety by lending to the support of their petitions such information as he possesses? Can such things be and not overcome us like a summer's dream? Where did this bespangled wosbird get the idea that he is authorized to spend the money Congress gives him telling Congressmen they have not the same rights as other American citizens?

They say officially, "inasmuch as it would be manifestly unjust to give preferred consideration to an applicant merely because he has solicited political or other pressure to bear upon his case, and in view of the fact that letters designed to do so can serve no useful purpose, but, on the contrary, simply add to the burden, confusion, and delay of the office personnel."

Gentlemen, it is with profound regret that I see so many of you adding to these personnel burdens—"the enlisted and enrolled men are informed that, all other things being equal, an attempt to secure preferred consideration by the exercise of the means hereinbefore specified, is likely to prejudice their cases in the eyes of the commandant. Signed C. S. Roberts, lieutenant commander, United States Navy, executive officer. Approved, A. H. Scales, captain, United States Navy, commandant."

Then he continues, editorially in the Bulletin, "every man with the Naval Reserve Force enlisted for the duration of the war and became a party to the contract with the United States of America when he took the oath and donned the uniform." The editorial concludes: "God Almighty hates a quitter; and so does the American Navy." Our commandant-editor says: "Every man entering the Navy pledged himself on his honor to serve the Navy of the Stars and Stripes until 'finis' has been written to the last chapter of the great war." The commandant-editor, on the paper bought by the congressional appropriation, tells us that will not happen "until the last American soldier has been brought back safely from the fields of Europe." Is this officer employed as a sailor or a diplomat? Was he taught the duties of a sailor or the duties of a statesman? The first duty of an officer of the Navy is to obey the laws made by Congress, and the second duty is to carry out the instructions of officers of higher rank, the highest of whom is a civilian and a politician.

Then, not content with having trod the boards in all the play-acting apparel becoming to one who mouths big words while the brothers and friends of the young men we have intrusted to his care for training in Chicago have gone to Europe to die for their country, this fellow, with the people's money, proceeds to traduce and villify their children, our gallant boys. This commandant-editor, because they want to go home and go to work and go to school, says of them:

"They have attempted to obtain political influence; they have secured false affidavits as to equally false dependency claims, which proved on investigation to be the most barefaced of lies, and the number of dying grandmothers mentioned would indicate to the unsophisticated that nothing short of Persian pox or the bubonic plague is raging throughout the Middle West."

Great God, gentlemen, must our constituents endure all this from the meanest of their servants? They have cast their pearls before swine. These boys that he is talking about are volunteers and gentlemen. They were not trained by the Republic at the expense of its workingmen and given big salaries at life jobs with nothing to do but villify and abuse better men. When there is no chance to die for the Nation they seek to go home and labor in its service. If this parasite gets justice, he will soon be sent by a court-martial to a place where he will earn by honest labor every meal he eats and he will march to everyone in the lock step which he would like to teach the crown princes of the Republic. The heirs of Abraham Lincoln, of the Middle West, in whose day no such vile thing could come to pass.

"The land that loves him guards his rest; the West, the West, the rowdy West."

That order and that editorial are the kind of slush you are spending money to print. Gentlemen, a Congressman of the United States is the accredited spokesman for and the legal Representative of 300,000 of the best people the world ever saw. They send him to express their wishes and protect their rights and their children wherever they can not go. They have a perfect right to join with a boy's kin and friends in explaining why he should be at home in school or at work. They would fail in their duty if they failed to support a just claim in response to the requests of those who send us here, and whenever a little fellow like that endeavors to throw contempt and disgrace and insult at the Congress of the United States because some of its Members have endeavored to secure the return to their communities of some boy who wants to be there there ought to be some investigation of it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think that a lot of this foolishness will be cut out after March 4 next?

Mr. LITTLE. I hope so. It never happened from 1861 to 1865 or in 1898 and 1899, and I am going to try to cut some of it out now, or lay the foundation for it. The trouble with these fellows is that when a captain goes to sea he naturally must have exceptional powers, and he naturally gets an exaggerated idea of his own importance on land. That affects the whole Navy, until it reaches the very top it now develops, apparently.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Take these people for example. They remind me of a captain of a transport on which I once crossed the ocean, having with me 500 American soldiers. It seemed that I did not have what he considered the proper respect for him; but I had 500 soldiers back of me, so it did not make very much difference whether I had any respect for him or not, as he soon found out.

He told a friend of mine in Manila, "That fellow does not understand the powers of a captain at sea; he does not know that I am a little god on my ship." No; I do not; and I do not propose to let any little head at Chicago, swelled with a little brief authority, teach me that he is "a little god." The people of America run this Republic; they pay the taxes and they support the Navy. As long as the alarms of war sweep the land they will send every son they have and every dollar, if needed; but when the time comes that the war ends, when the roll of the drums is heard no more, then the Navy becomes a very small cog in the machinery of this country, not comparable in importance and power and rights with the taxpayer, with the farmers, with the business men, with the schoolboy, or any man that goes to make up the great Republic. These people bear all the burdens in peace and fight all the battles in war of our great country, and we expect the Navy to make as little trouble as it can for the people who support it. They are not "little gods" in the Navy. If we are to be confronted here with statements like this, if every man dressed in a little brief authority is to play such tricks before high Heaven as make the angels weep, it is time that Congress should give some attention and consideration to it. There is no reason why a Congressman of the United States should not have the same right to write a letter to some little commandant telling why a boy ought to go home as anyone else. This is, it appears, almost the same situation that we have just heard from with respect to a higher authority in the Navy, from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It is time that the people in the departments of this country understand that the Congress of the United States is the highest authority in the Republic, that it represents by direct certificate the men who own and control the Republic and by whom all features of it are provided. There is no reason why this House should not stand upon its rights as representatives of the people of this great Nation.

Why should we be instructed in this fashion, through money of the people spent in the publication of this Official Bulletin, by permission of the House, without which he had no right to spend the money, as to what rights we have? Who makes the laws of this great Republic? By whose authority is that little chap up there in Chicago presuming to dictate to the Congress of the United States? So far as I am concerned, I propose to begin right now to see how many there are in the United States Navy who should not be there. This man talks about the war and what they should do, and what does he know about it? What war did he ever fight in? On what battleship did he ever go into battle? Possibly he has been under fire, and if he will bring me a certificate that he has risked his life in battle for the Republic, then I shall give him a little leeway to declare himself over the Congress of the United States, but if it turns out, as I anticipate it, that this is a little chap who was educated at the expense of the taxpayers over here at Annapolis, who has a life job with no work in peace of any practical importance, as compared with the taxpayers, who is now swelled up with the job he has, so that he wants to dictate to the taxpayers and their representatives, he is altogether too auspinarious, and I am going to do all I can to see that he gets out of the Navy and goes to work like the rest of them, as he should. [Applause.] If he thinks so little of Congress, he should not be forced to remain in its service, and since he thinks he has so much literary talent, he should be allowed opportunity to give it ample room and verge enough to give it full play. This is his maiden effort, I presume, published at the taxpayers' expense, just as it follows:

[Orders and notices appearing under this heading have received the approval of the commandant and are official. Copies of these orders and notices are not sent in letter form to the officers or persons addressed.]

NOTICE.

It has come to the knowledge of the commandant that there are numerous instances where applicants for discharge or release from active duty have themselves written or had relatives or friends write to Members of Congress and other presumably influential persons in an effort to bring pressure to bear upon the naval authorities to secure preferred consideration and early favorable action upon their applications.

In view of the large volume of correspondence now being received as a result of these solicitations, and the consequent heavy demands made upon the time and attention of the personnel of the commandant's office, it is imperatively necessary that all men should clearly understand that letters of this kind, importuning the naval authorities to grant requests for discharge or release, can in nowise operate to secure more speedy action than is contemplated by the plan now being observed, which seeks to effect the granting of such requests according to the degree of urgency existing in each case, as determined by the statements of the applicants, supporting affidavits, and the investigations of heads of departments, regimental commanders, and other immediate superiors.

Inasmuch as it would be manifestly unjust to give preferred consideration to an applicant merely because he has solicited political or other pressure to bear upon his case, and in view of the fact that letters designed to do so can serve no useful purpose, but, on the contrary, simply add to the burdens, confusion, and delay of the office personnel, enlisted and enrolled men are informed that, all other things being equal, an attempt to secure preferred consideration by the exercise of the means hereinbefore specified is likely to prejudice their cases in the eyes of the commandant.

C. S. ROBERTS,
Lieutenant Commander, United States Navy,
Executive Officer.

Approved.

A. H. SCALES,
Captain, United States Navy, Commandant.

Our billions were not expended, our boys did not die on the fields of France, to make the world easy for men who wear shoulder straps and so feel themselves better than their fellow men. The Department of the Navy is right now asking this Congress for billions of dollars to build ships, some of which this commandant and lieutenant commander—these official scribblers—might command. Men who will use the money of our taxpayers to publish these slanders with regard to their gallant sons, the unstained youth of the Republic, are not proper persons to be trusted with a great ship that cost $20,000,000 or with the lives of its crew. No ship should be built until we know just how many more of them have been educated at the public's expense and that not one remains in the public service. The King of France, the King of England, the Czar of Russia lost their thrones and lives when they undertook to contest with the people's representatives. Is it possible that somewhere in this Republic this propaganda to minimize the constitutional powers of the people's representatives and establish a military caste has a support which is encouraging such attacks on the lawmaking power, and such malicious, malevolent assaults upon the young men who really do all the fighting that is done when our flag is carried over the field of battle? The Congress of the United States owes it to its constituents to see that the men who committed this offense are properly punished.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, referring to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I want to repeat what I said a few moments ago. In connection with all of these deficiencies we asked the Navy Department for a statement showing all of the moneys which they had received and had available for the various purposes enumerated. They brought in such sheets, showing a given sum appropriated, so much of that sum expended as of a given date, so much in the Treasury. Against the amount that was in the Treasury were certain obligations, and then they had estimates as to what they needed to do in the way of meeting all of these obligations or canceling some of them or taking on new activities for the balance of the fiscal year. The testimony which the gentleman has correctly read was testimony relating not to the amount that was being asked as a deficiency but in explanation of the moneys which had been heretofore voted and which they were explaining the expenditure of. I do not know that it is material because it amounts to the same thing, because when an appropriation is here made it becomes a part of the funds heretofore appropriated for that purpose, but it illustrates what I stated awhile ago that, in my judgment, Congress can not control the situation simply by reducing amounts. The gentleman from Illinois says that if we do not vote the $4,300,000 we deal with the situation. I do not think we do anything of the kind. There is $42,000,000 remaining under the head of steam engineering. They could still use part of that money in payment for these Marconi stations if they saw fit to do it, and the nonvoting of this $4,300,000 would not in any way prevent the payment for the Marconi stations. The way to prevent that is for Congress affirmatively to say that they shall not do it, and the Committee on Appropriations tried to develop whatever facts they could so that Members of the House in reading the statements as to the purposes intended, as to moneys heretofore voted, might, if they saw fit, have Congress take such action as was deemed wise to prevent the continuation of matters.

Now, I do not know whether the language of appropriations under the head of the Bureau of Steam Engineering can be construed to authorize expenditures for these Marconi plants or not. Certainly I share the impression that most men would have, that it could not be; but if it can not be, then the comptroller will prevent any funds from that appropriation being expended for that purpose. What I wish the Congress would do, and what I think it ought to do, is where it finds departments proceeding to do something that it thinks they ought not to do, it ought to legislate to prevent it, because the cutting off of this fund with these large balances does not reach the evil. Now, I am not expressing an opinion touching the taking over of the Marconi stations. As I stated a while ago, my inclination and prima facie judgment is always against the taking over of commercial activities, particularly after the war has passed. I want to see the Government have as little to do with what the individual can do as possible. [Applause.] But there are men who do not share that view and who believe that in the matter of the wireless there ought to be and must be a monopoly. Now, it seems to me that the way to reach this matter is to have some proper legislative committee bring in a resolution preventing the expenditure of the money for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The Navy Department asked for legislation authorizing the purchase of this Marconi system. They wanted to take over all the wireless, and the legislative committee to which it was referred refused to give them the authority. We thought that it would require legislation to authorize them to do it and not that it would require legislation to prevent them from doing it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that was a proper conclusion.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And that is why——

Mr. SHERLEY. But it turns out that they have gone ahead. Now, we are dealing with a concrete situation, and I have nothing to say whether the Navy Department ought to have done it or not. I am neither advocating nor criticizing it at this moment, but I am trying to impress upon the committee that the practical way to deal with the situation which has arisen is affirmatively and not by simply striking out this amount of money, because I do not think that will accomplish the purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for five minutes, and I hope not to use all of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I just want to state this, if the gentleman will yield, in justification of the legislative committee having jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not criticized it. I am just stating the condition which now confronts the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I just wanted to state that the committee refused during the war to give them the authority, thinking that ended it. They proceeded upon some other legislation, whether it really authorized them or not I am not able to say, but they proceeded to take over these stations. Then, after the war is over—that is to say, after the armistice was signed—they came before the committee again with still another bill to take over all this radio business, and there were very elaborate hearings on both of those propositions, and the committee, after hearing all that was to be said, was unanimously of the opinion that that authority ought not to be given, so that, as far as that committee is concerned, they thought they had done all that ought to be done by simply withholding legislative authority.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quarreling with the committee, and I am frank to say that had I been Secretary of the Navy, and I had come to Congress and asked the power and they had not given it to me, I would not in peace time, certainly would not in war time, except as a matter of absolute necessity, have disregarded what seemed to be the plain intent of the Congress that the department should not go forward. But it develops that the department has gone forward. Now, it seems to me, if you want to correct the matter the way to do it is to prevent the spending of the moneys, and that you ought not to do that simply by cutting out this item, because there is still a lot of money which they can use if they are determined to do so.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. If there is so much money there which they can use, then it will not really materially damage them by waiting another month, probably not more than six weeks' time, when the two bills become a law, and get the money, would it——

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. MANN. Why not let it go out of this bill and put it on the general deficiency bill? This bill can not become a law, at the best, before the middle of February, even if it passes both houses, because the President will not be back before that time. The general deficiency bill will certainly become a law, because that will be passed, whether anything else is or not, by the 4th of March. Now that a controversy exists here, why not let it go out of this bill and let the committee make a further examination and put it, if necessary, on the general deficiency bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the first place, I am not willing to have placed on myself the labor of passing upon the Marconi wireless-system controversy.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can ascertain the facts about the purchase and more carefully determine as to whether it shall be made. Now, the gentleman stated it is easier for Congress to prohibit a thing being done. I am glad that the gentleman never made that statement in the House before, and I take it that is one of the humorous things he throws out as he is leaving us. The authority of the Government depends upon the authority given to them, and to say that whenever it is proposed to do something which Congress has not authorized, that Congress must legislate in order to prohibit, the gentleman knows it is theoretically impractical and physically impossible.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows it is not practicable until we pass a bill on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I try to be practicable, and I am not trying to be humorous with the House. I am dealing with a situation of which this is simply an incident and illustration, and which I think that Congress ought clearly to understand. We have voted huge sums of money under language permitting almost everything under the sun to be done by the various departments. Whether we ought to have done it or not men may differ, but all of us, without any great division, agreed we had to do it under the emergency of the war.

Now, these funds are there. They can be used. They are so great in quantity that there can be found out of various funds money enough to carry on a number of projects that you might want to stop. And therefore I suggested to the House in perfect good faith, and I repeat it, that you are not going to be able to reach them by simply the reduction of amounts in the bill. We are repealing here $7,000,000,000 of money, but we are leaving more than that amount of money with the departments to expend. Now, the reduction or increase of particular items will rarely so narrow the department, if it does not want to be narrowed, as to prevent them going forward with some proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, the very value of this hearing was to develop some of the activities that the department was going forward with, so that if Congress thought they ought not to go forward with them they might indicate in some manner that they should not do it. I am perfectly free to say this, and I have said it to the Secretary of War in talking with him about another matter, with which I shall deal later, that I feel the attitude of all the department heads ought to be that when the Congress indicates, even informally, that certain things ought not to be pursued the departments ought to refrain from pursuing them until they can ask of the Congress affirmative authority for doing them, because we have given these great sums without limitation, and unless the departments show that nice good faith with the Congress it will force us either to a repeal of all sums, with the chaos that would follow from that, or passing resolutions by Congress repeatedly that this department or that department shall not go forward with this, that, or the other thing.

Mr. MANN. If, as the gentleman says—and I think he is correct about that—the department would still have money enough to pay for the Marconi system out of the money they have on hand, then it would not seriously damage the department to postpone the deficiency appropriation, which they say they need, for two or three weeks, would it?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not think there would be any great damage if the item went out, but I do not think anything would be accomplished by its going out. I hope the debate here will have accomplished the purpose of calling the matter to the attention of the department.

Mr. MANN. I have great confidence in the gentleman's committee. Now, it is the fact that we have appropriated billions of dollars without much limitation. In this particular case I believe, however, the appropriation of $50,000,000 was made in practically the same language that has been carried for years under the Bureau of Enginering in the Navy Department, and there was no enlargement of authority. But having appropriated these immense sums of money largely without any limitation upon them, when occasion arises does not the gentleman and the House think that it is proper for Congress to pause for a moment and take into consideration the subject?

Mr. SHERLEY. Absolutely. And I am not complaining in the slightest degree of that.

Mr. MANN. And the only way to do it is to strike it out of this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Where the gentleman and I part in our routes is, that he thinks we will accomplish the purpose by striking out this $4,300,000 and I do not.

Mr. MANN. Where the gentleman and I part is here: It is the gentleman's duty, and he always attempts to faithfully perform his duty, to defend his bill on the floor of the House regardless of meritorious propositions that may be offered, and it is my duty to get the House to do the right thing regardless of what the Committee on Appropriations has reported.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. We brought in this item, as the statement shows, and we cut it down from $8,000,000 to this $4,300,000. For instance, there is going to be spent out of this fund, if the department carries out its present intention and is not prevented by action of Congress, quite a considerable amount of money in an argon plant at Fort Worth. Now, as far as the money goes the department could take that money and spend it for the Marconi business and leave subsequent appropriation to be made for the argon plant at Fort Worth. And the committee did not see how it could deal with such matters simply by denial of the money.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are we to understand that in this item calling for $4,300,000 there is included an appropriation for the construction and development of what is known as argon gas?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is not to conclude that but he is to conclude this: We have appropriated since the war started something like $107,000,000 under the head of engineering. They had expended up to November 1, $65,000,000 and some odd, and they had a Treasury balance on that date of $42,000,000. Now, out of that Treasury balance it is proposed to do quite a number of things, and among the things which they enumerate is this argon plant at Fort Worth, the payment for taking over the wireless Marconi stations, and a great many other things. The fact that you should eliminate $4,300,000 from that fund would not necessarily prevent their doing any one of the things, though it would prevent, to the extent of $4,300,000, the doing of all of them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the matter now pending before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the question in good faith. I want to find out what the parliamentary status is. I do not want to prevent discussion.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman from Kentucky know whether this so-called argon plant is the same thing as is sometimes called helium gas?

Mr. SHERLEY. My understanding is that it is the same, but I do not know anything about it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that that is only in the experimental stage at the present time?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the testimony did not leave that impression on my mind. I have gotten the impression either from this testimony or from other sources that we had developed this gas to the point of efficiency, and that it was a noninflammable gas. But I really do not know much about it.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think that is the condition of Members of the House, and my point is that if there is any possible way or means that we can adopt to stop the appropriation of $3,000,000 for the construction of a plant to develop anything that is yet to any extent in the experimental stage it will be a good thing to stop it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I felt very much the way the gentleman did, but the committee did not feel warranted, in view of the fact that they have gone on with the proposition and it was nearly completed, to stop it short. We developed the facts so that the Congress might do it if it wanted to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the location of these Marconi stations?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are along the coast, but I do not know just where they are.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are they all on the coast?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they are.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, $4,300,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Pages 16 and 17, strike out lines 25 and 26 on page 16 and lines 1 and 2 on page 17.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Alabama wants to move an amendment, he can do so, but he can not amend the amendment by a substitute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a preferential motion to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Strike out "$4,300,000," on page 17, line 2, and insert "$1,250,000" and the following: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated herein shall be used for purchase of radio stations."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee, as a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, that the statements submitted to the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE], and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] represent the action that was taken by that committee with reference to this general proposition. I do not know of and I have been unable to locate any authority of law conferring upon the Secretary of the Navy the power to purchase radio stations. The hearings disclose the fact that he has entered into an agreement to purchase not only the Marconi system of radio stations but also those owned by the Federal Radio Systems. Those are the only two purchases involved in any scheme or plan proposed by the Secretary of the Navy. The aggregate sum of these two contracts to purchase amounts to $3,050,000,000, and I assume that the balance over and above that sum, carried in this paragraph, is made up of other items that are really authorized by law.

The purpose of my amendment and the effect of the amendment is to reduce the appropriation proposed in the paragraph by exactly the amount of the proposed sums to be paid for the purchase of these radio systems, and it has a proviso, Mr. Chairman, to the effect that the amount left in, to wit, $1,250,000, shall not be used for the purchase of radio stations. In other words, it seems to me that until some further investigation, such as might be thought to be desirable, can be given, if the matter is to be carried in a subsequent deficiency bill, my amendment corrects any abuse that might have been indulged in by the Secretary of the Navy or any unauthorized power he may have used in the purchase of these stations, and leaves an amount in the paragraph sufficient for uses that might be legitimate and necessary for the other purposes brought out by the committee and, as a matter of fact, authorized by law. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will see fit in his sound judgment to accept this amendment, because, it seems to me, it protects the interests of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I shall vote for his amendment and then for my own amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope my amendment will meet with the gentleman's entire approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment would simply affect $1,250,000 of money, and would still leave all the forty-odd million dollars they have available for this purpose, if it be available. The way to get at it, if you wanted to get at it and express the opinion of the House, would be to put a limitation on all moneys.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, then, to modify my amendment and make it apply to all moneys.

Mr. SHERLEY. That, however, I suggest to the gentleman, makes his amendment subject to a point of order. I shall not personally make the point, because I think if the House wants to express its view on the matter it is all right that it should.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to provide for appropriations heretofore or hereafter made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. How will it read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 2, strike out "$4,300,000" and insert "$1,250,000: Provided, That no part of the money appropriated herein or heretofore shall be used for the purchase of radio stations."

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not agree to that amendment, and I reserve a point of order on it. If the gentleman will make the language read so as to apply to the amendment for repairs, preservation, and renewals of machinery, and so forth, under the head of the Bureau of Steam Engineering——

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not let it read, "heretofore appropriated under this item"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am willing to do that. What I want to meet is the present situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to meet the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman ought to limit it to the Marconi stations, because there is certain work in connection with our own stations that ought not to be interfered with.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want it to cover the Federal system that has been contracted for.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a closed incident, apparently. Mr. Chairman, in view of the uncertainty of the matter, I do not feel at liberty to permit the modification of the amendment to the extent that the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Is it the gentleman's understanding that these Marconi wireless stations are located on the seaboard?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is my impression. I have not very much information about it. There has been a committee working on this matter for weeks that ought to be prepared to give you that information.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, is it also the gentleman's understanding—I believe it is, from what he intimated a moment ago—that the passage of the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Alabama would be equivalent to the House saying that it prefers to have the Marconi wireless stations left in private hands?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would consider that that was a fair conclusion to be drawn from the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think that necessarily follows as a conclusion. The purpose of this amendment is to limit the appropriation to amounts already authorized by law.

Mr. SHERLEY. The effect of the amendment and the purpose of it are very different things. Unfortunately the gentleman has not presented an amendment which would prevent the taking over and paying for the Marconi stations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is my understanding from the discussion here, and especially from the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], that the passage of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] would be equivalent to the House saying that, in its opinion, the Marconi wireless stations should be left in private hands. Now, we should keep clearly in mind the question before us. It does not, as I see it, involve the general question of Government ownership as against private ownership. For these Marconi stations upon the seaboard present a very unique problem—one sui generis. There is no other like it. These stations convey information to and from warships or commercial vessels, hostile or friendly, a thousand or two thousand miles out from our shores. The question is: Is it wise to leave an agency of that kind in private hands? This is a question very different from the question of leaving an inland telegraph system—say, a line from Chicago to Omaha—in private hands. To leave in private hands a row of wireless stations along the Atlantic or the Pacific seaboard, with their ability to communicate in the daytime or in the nighttime with hostile ships 1,500 or 2,000 miles from our shores, suggests a problem of an exceedingly important and serious character; and therefore it is perhaps not surprising that the Navy Department desired to secure control and beyond peradventure to retain control.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that the Navy already have full control of all these stations and are and have been in operation of them?
